EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

In 2014, the human rights situation in Tibet continued to deteriorate. Human rights violations continued and the laws enabling the abuses targeted more people more severely. The benefits and reforms that the government of the People's Republic of China (PRC) frequently cites to justify its control over Tibet failed to materialize and failed to reach Tibetan communities.

The PRC cracked down against Tibetans in response to mining protests, protests against forced displays of loyalty, religious practices, and the continuation of the self-immolations protests. In response to self-immolations and people attending religious festivals, local governments in Tibet imposed collective punishments. The collective punishments specifically targeted people who were uninvolved in the prohibited activity. Family members and even entire villages could be subject to fines, the deprivation of political rights, the loss of their jobs and property, and all government benefits.

For people who committed the acts the risks became more severe. An increasing number of Tibetans died in detention. Their deaths were the results of torture, beatings, and the denial of medical care. In some cases the victims were released from prison on medical parole shortly before they died. In all cases, their bodies showed unmistakable evidence of abuse.

The imposition of collective punishments and killing people during detention violates the PRC's international legal obligations. This is exacerbated because people are punished for exercising their human rights. Peaceful protesters were frequently targeted by the PRC's security forces in 2014. The security forces fired at the protesters, detained those they could, and subjected an entire village to severe interrogations. International law protects the right to freedom of peaceful assembly. Peaceful assemblies can only be restricted if the government can demonstrate that specific criteria are met. In Tibet, the PRC cracked down against almost every protest. The required criteria were never met.

The use of coercive power against Tibetans will only increase. In 2014, the PRC expanded its security presence in Tibet. This included the introduction of more officials to watch, report on, and punish Tibetans. It also included the introduction of technology designed to facilitate the persecution in Tibet. The infamous Grid Management system, allowed security personnel to know more about what is happening in Tibet. Other measures, for instance the use of surveillance technology, allowed the PRC to delve deeper into what Tibetans, and monks in particular, were doing. These measures violate Tibetans' right to privacy and represent the continuation of failed security policies. If the PRC hopes to achieve stability in Tibet it must abolish the repressive policies that Tibetans are resisting.

To better understand the scope of the PRC's repressive policies, TCHRD created a special team to work on the political prisoner database. The TCHRD political prisoner database is now one of the most comprehensive Tibetan political prisoner databases in the world. It draws upon data from the US Congressional Executive Committee on China (CECC), Tibetan NGOs, and media reports to determine whom the PRC detained and for what reason. Because of the work of TCHRD's special team, the total number of known Tibetan political prisoners increased to 2,110. This includes the 137 Tibetans who were either detained or sentenced in 2014. However, TCHRD's political prisoner database still represents a minimum estimate of the number of political prisoners. Because of the difficulty of getting information out of Tibet, there will inevitably be cases that are unreported. Accordingly, the actual number of Tibetan political prisoners is higher than the number listed in the database.

When confronted with information about the deteriorating human rights situation in Tibet, the PRC frequently responds by referring to how Tibet has benefitted from the PRC's governance. This response has long been recognized as a distraction. However, research of official data from the PRC carried out by TCHRD in 2014 demonstrates that these claims are also false. When the PRC's statistical data is disaggregated it reveals that areas with majority Tibetan populations are consistently worse off than other parts of the PRC. This is particularly true in the education and health. On average Tibetans receive less education than other parts of the PRC. They also live shorter lives. Children are particularly impacted. For Tibetan areas the infant mortality rate, the percentage of malnourished children under 5 years old, and children's access to healthcare are all among the worst in the PRC.

The disparity between the PRC's claims and reality is particularly pronounced for Tibetan nomads. For years the PRC has been implementing policies that resettle the Tibetan nomads. The nomads are told their resettlement is necessary for development and to protect the environment. In the resettlement villages they are promised modern building and amenities. In many cases the benefits of resettlement do not reach the Tibetans. Mining destroys the environment. The benefits from mining and other businesses are received by people in eastern parts of the PRC. The resettled Tibetans are forced to sell their livestock and go into debt to pay for substandard housing that lacks basic utilities.

In 2014, there was no indication that the PRC took any measures to actually improve human rights. The reforms the PRC had announced had no impact. However, the tightening of security in Tibet was dramatic. Both the laws that enabled further human rights violations and the imposition of harsher extrajudicial punishments caused the human rights situation in Tibet to deteriorate. The purported benefits of the PRC's governance do not exist. TCHRD's analysis of health and education in Tibet reveals consistent and systemic problems that make Tibetan areas among the least well-educated and healthy places in the PRC. There is no indication that the PRC is willing to recognise, let alone address any of these issues. As a result, the human rights situation in Tibet is likely to continue to deteriorate as the PRC blindly pursues failed policies.

COLLECTIVE PUNISHMENT

In 2014, various methods of collective punishment were implemented in Tibet. These punishments focussed on discouraging self-immolations, attendance of religious festivals and protests by punishing innocent people unconnected with the event. This reflects the repressive tactics by the People's Republic of China (PRC) and local officials to prevent different forms of protests without addressing their root cause—the repressive tactics used against Tibetans. It also violates international human rights protections including the prohibition of arbitrary detention and the guarantee of a fair trial.

Officials in charge of Tibetan areas are punished if a self-immolation occurs. The PRC's authorities believe they can only increase investment or impose harsh measures in Tibet.<sup>1</sup> Accordingly, it was inevitable that local officials would respond to self-immolations by punishing people affiliated with the self-immolator but not involved in the self-immolation. Since at least 2012, PRC officials have punished households and villages because of self-immolations.<sup>2</sup> New formal regulations were distributed to every person in Dzoegé (Ch: Ru'ergai) County in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture (TAP) in Sichuan Province.<sup>3</sup>

These regulations stated that the self-immolator's family would be punished along with the self-immolator's village or monastery.<sup>4</sup> Adopting and posting these new regulations literally added the PRC's stamp of approval to collective punishment.

The PRC is unwilling to address the root causes of protests and instead believes it must respond by imposing harsh penalties. This approach is generally ineffective against self-immolators. By setting themselves on fire, the self-immolators put themselves beyond retribution from the PRC.<sup>5</sup> Laws punishing people close to the self-immolator are designed to extend the reach of the PRC's retribution.

Unsurprisingly, the use of collective punishment has expanded beyond retribution for self-immolations. In 2014, Tibetans have been threatened with or suffered from collective punishments if someone attends a prayer festival or protests. These laws and penalties are designed to punish innocent people with the goal of discouraging Tibetans from exercising their human rights. They are impermissible under international law.

I. Legal Standards

Collective punishment is the punishment of a population for the conduct of an individual.<sup>6</sup> It is specifically prohibited during armed conflicts.<sup>7</sup> However, there is no explicit prohibition of collective punishment outside of armed conflicts.<sup>8</sup> Instead, the prohibition against collective punishment outside of armed conflicts can be deduced from the right to a fair trial and other rights.<sup>9</sup> The United Nations Human Rights Committee recognised that collective punishment, like torture, slavery, and violations of the right to life, is impermissible even in cases of public emergency when the life of the nation is threatened.<sup>10</sup>

The most important aspect of collective punishment is that it involves extending the punishment beyond the criminal. Criminal punishments usually involve detention but can also include fines and the deprivation of political rights.<sup>11</sup> In addition to the Human Rights Committee, regional human rights treaties and courts have recognised that extending criminal penalties to other people is a human rights violation. The Organization of American States,<sup>12</sup> the African Union,<sup>13</sup> the Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers,<sup>14</sup> and the European Court of Human Rights<sup>15</sup> all recognise that criminal responsibility must be limited to the perpetrator. These different organisations have framed the prohibition in different manners, but inevitably determine that imposing criminal punishments on people uninvolved with the criminal act is a human rights violation.

Whether it is framed as humane treatment,<sup>16</sup> the right to a fair trial,<sup>17</sup> or the right to be presumed innocent,<sup>18</sup> collective punishment is prohibited. These are different ways of articulating the same general idea—that people should not be punished for the conduct of another. Punishing people for what somebody else does means that there is nothing the victim can do to avoid the penalty. Collective punishment implicitly creates an obligation that uninvolved people prevent others from acting—and punishes them if they do not.

As recognised by the European Court of Human Rights, the prohibition of punishing people for someone else's action is a fundamental rule of criminal law.<sup>19</sup> Even though it is not explicitly guaranteed by international human rights instruments, its prohibition can be inferred from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR)<sup>20</sup> and has been recognised by the Human Rights Committee.<sup>21</sup> These obligations are part of customary international law and are binding on all States—including the PRC.<sup>22</sup>

II. Chinese Law

Like international human rights law, Chinese law does not explicitly prohibit collective punishment. However, because the prohibition is fundamental to criminal law, there are numerous places within the PRC's criminal code where the prohibition could be deduced. The entire first chapter of the PRC's criminal code, which defines its aims, basic principles and scope, refers exclusively to people who commit crimes.<sup>23</sup> For example, Article 4 states, "The law shall be equally applied to anyone who commits a crime"<sup>24</sup> and Article 3 states, "For acts that are explicitly defined as criminal acts in law, the offenders shall be convicted and punished in accordance with law; otherwise, they shall not be convicted or punished."<sup>25</sup>

Collective punishment punishes omissions and not actions. People are given criminal penalties for the criminal acts of another person. Therefore, the imposition of collective punishment not only violates international human rights law, but also the PRC's own domestic law.

III. Self-Immolation

In April 2013, PRC officials in Dzoegé (Ch: Ru'ergai) County in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture (TAP) in Sichuan Province announced collective punishment for a self-immolator's relatives, village and monastery.<sup>26</sup> Information about the new rules came out of Tibet in late 2013.<sup>27</sup> These rules were not the first to impose collective punishments following a self-immolation. However, they were a substantial expansion and escalation of the policy.

In 2012, the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) translated an official notification announcing punishments following self-immolations in Malho (Ch: Huangnan) TAP in Qinghai Province.<sup>28</sup> That notification contained five substantive paragraphs. Four of the paragraphs focused on prohibiting and punishing people from greeting, offering condolences or giving donations to the family of a self-immolator.<sup>29</sup> Only the first paragraph imposed direct collective punishment. It stated that public benefits for the self-immolator's household and projects using government money would be cancelled. Township level officials would be investigated, barred from promotion for a year and subjected to public criticism.<sup>30</sup> If there were multiple self-immolations, the township would have all government-funded projects cancelled for three years.<sup>31</sup> The township leader would also be removed from office.

The 2013 Dzoegé County punishments built upon those enacted in Malho in 2012. In 15 points, the document listed various punishments for the self-immolator's relatives, village and monastery. Unlike the Malho document, there was no listed punishment for government officials.

In the document, family members are equated with active participants in the self-immolation. As a result, they face punishments that are designed to make their lives at best difficult, if not impossible. In Dzoegé County, people related to a self-immolator are prevented from establishing a business, applying for a government job, or receiving aid if they cannot make a living. Any money borrowed is immediately due back. Presumably, this includes money that ordinarily would not be due for months or years. The relatives are also prohibited from leaving the PRC or going to the TAR, and are explicitly prohibited from participating in elections.<sup>32</sup> The loss of political rights, including not being allowed to vote in elections, is a punishment under the PRC's criminal code.<sup>33</sup> All of these rules are specifically designed to be punishments for something the victims did not participate in. The imposition of these penalties, and others, is merely because of their connection to a self-immolator. As such, it is collective punishment and in violation of international law.<sup>34</sup>

The document does not draw as explicit a connection between the self-immolator's village and criminal activity, but still punishes the village and villagers or the self-immolator's monastery. As with family members, all public benefits, including disaster relief, are prohibited for three years following a self-immolation and all loans are immediately due. Additionally, each village must deposit between 10,000 and 50,000 yuan (US$1,609-8,045). If there is a self-immolation within two years, the money is taken by the state treasury and another deposit is required. This deposit is the functional equivalent of a fine. The self-immolator's monastery's right to recognise Buddhist affairs and major Buddhist events is restricted. Villagers, monks, nuns and other people from the self-immolator's village and township must undergo legal education. The place where a self-immolation occurs is subject to a "harsh crackdown and punishment."<sup>35</sup>

All of these measures are explicitly punishments. Some, such as the deprivation of political rights for the self-immolator's family, fining the village, or imposing harsh crackdowns, are criminal punishments. They are imposed on people without them performing any criminal act. Every penalty against the village, including the fines, recalling loans, and denying disaster aid, is inherently a collective punishment.

The document explicitly equated being a self-immolator's relative with "active criminal involvement," but in other instances the connection between the penalty and the criminal action is unstated. The most dramatic example is imposing a harsh crackdown and punishment merely because a self-immolation occurred at that place. However, in all cases, the punishments are inflicted on people who did nothing. They are prohibited by international law.

Despite the threat of punishing innocent, uninvolved people, there have still been self-immolations in Dzoegé County. Sixteen days after the documents were posted throughout Dzoegé County two monks from Taktsang Lhamo Kirti Monastery, Konchok Woeser and Lobsang Dawa, died during a self-immolation protest.<sup>36</sup> On 8

June 2013, Tenzin Yarphel, the Party Secretary for Dzoegé County, was demoted.<sup>37</sup> The official reason was his inability to stop the self-immolation protests, though others suspected that it was because of his growing popularity among local Tibetans.<sup>38</sup> On 20 July 2013, three months after the document was released, Kunchok Sonam, an 18-year-old monk from Thangkor Sogtsang Monastery in Dzoegé County committed a self-immolation protest.<sup>39</sup> Troops descended on Kunchok Sonam's monastery and one monk was detained.<sup>40</sup>

The restrictions on information coming from Tibet make it difficult to know whether the troop presence in Thangkor Sogtsang Monastery was an example of the collective punishment document being implemented. However, any form of collective punishment in response to self-immolation protests would violate international human rights standards and the PRC's international legal obligations.

IV. Religious Festivals

The imposition of collective punishment for self-immolations in Dzoegé County was the most severe example in 2014. It was not the only form of collective punishment. In July 2014, TCHRD received an incomplete copy of regulations in Diru (Ch: Biru) County in Nagchu (Ch: Naqu) Prefecture, TAR.<sup>41</sup> If the regulations had only prohibited Tibetans from travelling and attending religious festivals they would be almost unremarkable. Those rights are routinely violated in Tibet. However, the regulations go one step further and threaten to punish the family members of people who travel and attend religious festivals. This form of collective punishment, through an official regulation, violates the PRC's human rights obligations.

The regulations specifically prohibited holding or participating in the Great Prayer Festival (Monlam Chenmo).<sup>42</sup> By also banning crossing national borders to participate in the "Great Prayer Festival," the regulations implicitly included attending the Kalachakra Empowerment, which was in Ladakh, India in July 2014.<sup>43</sup> Both the Great Prayer Festival and the Kalachakra Empowerment are extremely important Buddhist festivals.

Like the 2012 Malho collective punishment document, the regulations from Diru stated they were adopted to preserve social stability.<sup>44</sup> Also like the Malho document, the regulations only partially focused on collective punishment. Articles 2 and 3 explicitly provide collective punishment on the parents, spouse, and children of people who attend religious festivals. Some of the punishments, for example the denial of public benefits, are the same as those for self-immolations.<sup>45</sup>

The Diru regulations also expanded upon the penalties for self-immolations. The punishments for a self-immolation were in part designed to make it impossible for people to earn a living. This was accomplished by refusing to grant them permission to open a business and not allowing them to apply for government jobs.<sup>46</sup> The regulations from Diru prohibit Tibetans from harvesting caterpillar fungus for three to five years.<sup>47</sup> Especially because many Tibetans rely on caterpillar fungus for their livelihood, prohibiting the harvesting of caterpillar fungus is designed to make it impossible for Tibetans to earn a living.<sup>48</sup>

In addition to preventing family members from earning a living while simultaneously removing the social safety net that is designed to catch them if they fall, the regulations also impose administrative penalties. Article 2 of the regulations allude to criminal punishments and states that if there are no criminal punishments then the person should be subjected to six months of legal education. Legal education is a form of administrative punishment in the PRC that has moved to replace the infamous re-education system, where prisoners were detained without a trial, forced to work, and tortured.<sup>49</sup>

By punishing people for someone else's action the Diru regulations are a form of collective punishment. The regulations attempt to correlate the conduct of one family member with that of all family members. The articles containing collective punishment allow for the punishment of an individual violating the regulation, then adds the clause "including their parents, spouses, and children."<sup>50</sup> This implies that the parents, spouses, and children are responsible for violating the regulations in the same way as the person who is actually acting. The punishments in the Diru regulations are similar to the 2012 Malho regulations, which raises the possibility that they could be expanded and become more restrictive.

However, even without any changes, the Diru regulations imply criminal responsibility without any actual criminal conduct. As a result, it violates the PRC international legal obligations.

V. Informal Collective Punishment

Both the punishments for self-immolations and attending religious festivals were official documents that threatened collective punishment. Without the support of official documents, security personnel in the PRC also imposed collective punishment in 2014. Security personnel imposed punishments that were in effect collective punishment.

On 12 August 2014, Tibetans in Kardze (Ch: Ganzi) TAP in Sichuan Province gathered to protest the detention of Wangdak, a respected village leader.<sup>51</sup> Chinese paramilitary forces opened fire on the peaceful protesters. Ten Tibetans were injured including four who died.<sup>52</sup> That evening an unknown number of Tibetans from Denma Shugpa Village were detained. The next day security forces surrounded the village and detained everyone who could not escape. The remaining people, mostly women, children, and the elderly, were subjected to strict interrogations and restrictions.<sup>53</sup> These interrogations and restrictions indiscriminately punished as many people in the village as possible for the protest.

Unlike in Dzoge and Diru, there was no official document announcing collective punishment.

However, by targeting the village, the security personnel imposed a collective punishment. They subjected people who had not done anything to strict interrogations and restrictions. Everyone in the village was punished because some people attended a protest. Penalizing people for exercising the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is a violation of the PRC's international legal obligations (see Chapter III: Freedom of Assembly). Punishing an entire village because some villagers engaged in a protest intensifies the repression in Tibet and sacrifices human rights protections.

VI. Conclusion

This chapter has focused narrowly on instances where the PRC has punished people for something done by somebody else. The three examples are the most extreme cases of collective punishment in Tibet in 2014. However, the PRC has also implemented other forms of punishment that target people for the conduct of others.

In Jomda (Ch: Jiangda) County in the Chamdo (Ch: Changdu) Prefecture in TAR, families were required to tell their relatives who are monks or nuns studying at Buddhist institutions or monasteries in Qinghai or Sichuan to end their studies and come home.<sup>54</sup> Even if families did tell their relatives to come home, they faced punishments, including the denial of government assistance, if their relatives did not return.<sup>55</sup> This is a form of collective punishment where family members are penalized for the conduct of their relatives. However, it is subtler than the previous examples because it requires some initial participation by the family members.

The entire community in Diru County has been subjected to other restrictions. These restrictions are designed to target the entire community, presumably in response to protests. They include retroactively labelling all stupas, mounds of mani stones, and shrines built after 2010 illegal and requiring their destruction.<sup>56</sup> Also, like in Jomda County, families are required to remove children aged 12 or younger from monasteries. They can be punished with six months of detention or one to three years in prison if they refuse.<sup>57</sup> Travel into and from Diru has also been disrupted by roadblocks that slow travel and fine or detain travellers.<sup>58</sup> People who complain are beaten.<sup>59</sup> These punishments are targeted at Diru as a whole and can be characterised as collective punishments. However, they also more directly infringe on people's right to freedom of religion and freedom of travel.

The reliance on collective punishment represents a new approach toward ensuring stability in Tibet. It belies the PRC's claim that only a small number of Tibetans are unhappy with the PRC control over Tibet. If the entire community is made responsible for a self-immolation or protest, or an entire family can be punished for where one member travels or studies, then implicitly the resistance against the PRC is collective. At a more basic level, collective punishment is the PRC's attempt to get retribution when the actor is beyond its reach.<sup>60</sup> Under international law, imposing these collective punishments is illegal.

DEATH IN DETENTION

In 2014 Tibet witnessed a growing number of deaths in detention. These cases involved torture and politically motivated killings. Usually, detained Tibetan protesters were tortured and denied medical treatment merely for protesting.<sup>61</sup> Sometimes, particular Tibetan prisoners were singled out and killed for political purposes. At least four Tibetans died in 2014 because of their treatment in detention. This includes Tibetan prisoners who died after being released on medical parole so that prison officials would not be penalised for their deaths.

Granting dying Tibetans medical parole is just one tactic used to conceal the number of Tibetans who die because of their treatment in detention. Another prominent tactic is intimidating family members to prevent them from speaking out. These tactics succeed in hiding an unknown number of deaths in detention. This section focuses on the increase in known instances of death in detention. As the People's Republic of China (PRC) has only tightened its control on information and has restricted transparency, it can be inferred that there is also an increase in the number of unknown deaths in detention.

On 21 November 2014, Bachen Gyewa (aka Ngawang Monlam), a popular and respected Tibetan village headman of Ushung Village was removed from his post, detained and then killed in police custody. Bachen Gyewa had gained the trust of fellow villagers and initiated development projects aimed at preserving and promoting Tibetan culture and religion. His killing in detention was explicitly ordered by the party secretary of the Diru (Ch: Biru) County in Nagchu (Ch: Naqu) Prefecture, Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR).<sup>62</sup>

The extrajudicial killing of Bachen Gyewa, which occurred in police custody, was motivated by political factors. These factors are the driving force behind the PRC's 'stability maintenance' measures. Bachen Gyewa's death represents the larger political realities that allow the PRC's security organisations to torture and kill with impunity. The 'stability maintenance' measures are focused on retaining the party power and protecting the interests of the party.

In Tibet, death in detention mostly occurs in the early days after the victim is detained or during police interrogation. Former Tibetan detainees have spoken about routine beatings and other torture methods during the interrogation phase that could extend for weeks, months, and sometimes a year. Jigme Gyatso (aka Golog Jigme), a Tibetan monk who was detained multiple times for assisting the Tibetan filmmaker Dhondup Wangchen in 2008 and who recently escaped to India, spoke of his experiences in various detention facilities. On 28 May 2014, at a press conference soon after his arrival in India, Jigme Gyatso said, "When I was first arrested, my hands and feet were shackled and 62 Extrajudicial killing, arbitrary detention and religious repression continue in restive Tibetan county, 15 December 2014, TCHRD, <http://www.tchrd.org/2014/12/arbitrary-arrests-extrajudicial-killing-and-religious-repression-continue-in-restive-tibetan-county/>.

I was suspended from the ceiling for 10 hours. Later, I experienced similar torture seven times, which often lasted between two to five hours. Even today I suffer from severe pain in the backbone and ribs and my knee dislocates whenever my body gets cold.”<sup>63</sup> The torture methods ranged from severe beatings and use of ‘tiger chairs’ to burning cigarettes and medical torture.<sup>64</sup>

The growing number of death in detention cases indicates that recent changes made to the PRC’s legal system to reform detention conditions, including the impermissibility of forced confessions in judicial proceedings, have little impact. Law enforcement agencies continue to engage in widespread and systematic use of torture to extract confessions. During torture, victims are told not to talk about the rule of law and reforms that ostensibly prohibit torture.<sup>65</sup> Increasingly, these brutal tactics are killing the victims.

I. Legal Standards for the Treatment of Prisoners

Death in detention is a form of extrajudicial killing and prohibited by international law. An extrajudicial killing is a killing that takes place outside of the judicial system. It not only violates the right to life, but also violates the prohibitions of torture, arbitrary detention, and enforced disappearance.

Torture is universally prohibited in the Convention Against Torture that the PRC ratified in 1988.

Article 2(2) of the Convention states: “[n]o exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture.”<sup>66</sup>

The PRC is a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). As a signatory, the PRC is obliged not to defeat the object and purpose of the ICCPR.<sup>67</sup> The object and purpose of the ICCPR, and other human rights treaties, is to protect human dignity.<sup>68</sup> Additionally, many of the substantive articles in the ICCPR are part of customary international law and binding on all States.<sup>69</sup> These include the right to life and the prohibition of arbitrary detention.<sup>70</sup>

Article 9 of the ICCPR prohibits arbitrary arrest and detention and requires that anyone deprived of her liberty be given an effective opportunity to challenge the lawfulness of their detention before a court.<sup>71</sup> Article 6 guarantees the right to life stating “No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life”.<sup>72</sup> Article 7 prohibits torture.<sup>73</sup> Additionally Article 10 states, “All persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person.”<sup>74</sup>

In addition to these broad international standards, there are more specific standards that build upon the human rights system to provide guidance for the treatment of prisoners and the conduct of medical professionals. The United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (SMR) are a non-legally binding set of rules that provide guidance for the treatment of prisoners while still allowing for legal, social, economic and geographic differences. However, they may reflect customary international law as they have been treated as binding by various domestic courts and a large number of countries reported (including the PRC) that their national legislation was either based on or influenced by the standards. The incorporation of the SMR in domestic legislation of many countries reinforces an essential element of international and, indeed, domestic human rights standards. Canada says that the SMR are very persuasive and useful for interpreting human rights obligations.<sup>75</sup> The SMR outline good principles and practices for the treatment of prisoners and management of prison facilities.

In January 2014, the United Nations (UN) Intergovernmental Expert Group on the revision of the SMR was to gather for a meeting in Brazil to consider proposed changes to the SMR to increase transparency in prisons.<sup>76</sup> The proposed revisions require that deaths during detention, or soon after the release of a prisoner, be investigated by an impartial body to ensure that the deaths were not caused by prison officials.

In October 2013, months before the meeting, the PRC opposed requiring investigations of deaths that occur shortly after a prisoner is released—even if these deaths are for non-natural, violent or unknown reasons.<sup>77</sup> Such a requirement would call for the PRC, and other States, to investigate the widespread mistreatment of prisoners that it refuses to acknowledge and attempts to hide from the world. The PRC said that “soon after release” is too vague and that once a person is out of prison they are no longer the prison’s responsibility.

An investigation should determine whether a person’s death was caused by a violation of SMR provisions. For example, the SMR state that all prisoners should receive adequate medical care.<sup>78</sup> This obligation adds clarity to Article 12 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which the PRC is a party to, that requires that people be allowed the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health.<sup>79</sup>

Additionally, in 1974 the UN General Assembly passed a resolution on principles of medical ethics. While not legally binding on its own, the resolution recognised and emphasized a pre-existing rule of international law—that nobody is allowed to participate in torture. The resolution emphasised that medical professionals should not use their unique knowledge or position to facilitate torture. The SMR and the resolution on the principles of medical ethics make clear that States cannot deny somebody medical care during their detention and medical professionals should not assist in any activity that will contribute to torture.

Despite these obligations, Goshul Lobsang was given pain-inducing injections while he was tortured. He died on 14 March 2014 after being released to his family on medical parole. His family was forced to sign a letter stating that his condition was due to “natural causes.”<sup>80</sup> This was not only a violation of international law but also a violation of medical ethics. Normally, the use of techniques to make torture more painful does not result in any further violations of international law. This is because the fundamental question under international law is whether a person was tortured, not how much the victim was tortured.

Despite the PRC’s obligation to prevent death during detention and its obligation to investigate the deaths that do occur, there are no known instances of any investigations or prosecutions resulting from the death of a Tibetan in detention. Government officials responsible for subjecting detainees to extreme and violent treatments have not been made accountable for their discretionary use of power.

II. Death in Detention

The Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) has previously reported on attempts by Chinese police to conceal deaths in detention. Cases like Goshul Lobsang’s are part of a growing trend of abuse and death of Tibetans detained in the PRC. In 2009, Phuntsok, 27, a monk at Drango Monastery, was beaten to death and his body left at a base of a hill in Drango (Ch: Luhuo) County in Kardze (Ch: Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture (TAP), Sichuan Province. Local Tibetans who found the body and cremated it said they had seen cuts and bruises on the monk’s body. He was detained in March 2009 for pasting leaflets critical of the Chinese government. He died after less than a week in detention.<sup>81</sup> In 2008, Dawa, 31, a Tibetan farmer died within two weeks of his release from detention.<sup>82</sup>

In January 2014, more than ten years after his death, TCHRD obtained new details on Nyima Dakpa Kyeri, another Tibetan political prisoner, who died because of his treatment police custody four years after his arrest in March 2000 in Tawu (Ch: Daofu) County in Kardze (Ch: Ganzi) TAP, Sichuan Province. During his six-month detention, he endured interrogation and torture in three different detention facilities in Lhasa, Chengdu and Tawu. On 5 October 2000, he was sentenced to nine years in prison. He died at his home on 1 October 2003. Photographs showed an emaciated Nyima Dakpa Kyeri on his deathbed with a breathing tube attached to his nose, an IV attached to one arm and a heart rate monitor attached to the other.<sup>83</sup>

On 17 December 2013, less than a month into his secret detention, senior Tibetan Buddhist scholar and master Ngawang Jampel, 45, died in police custody in Diru (Ch: Biru) County in Nagchu (Ch: Naqu) Prefecture in TAR.<sup>84</sup> The detention officers quickly gave his body to his family members and intimidated them to keep the whole incident secret. On 20 January 2014, police in Diru County handed over the body of Konchok Dakpa, a Tibetan youth from Chamram Village in Diru Township, to his family after holding him incommunicado for weeks since his arrest in December 2013. Konchok Dakpa was severely beaten and tortured during his secret detention, indicating that his death was the direct result of police torture.<sup>85</sup>

Some prisoners who are no longer able to work in prison and are on the verge of dying are then released on “medical parole” before the completion of their prison term to avoid any responsibility on the part of the prison officials. Others suffer from the injuries they sustained during interrogation that were left untreated during imprisonment. It takes them years to succumb to their injuries.

Goshul Lobsang survived almost four months after his premature release from prison on medical parole in Machu (Ch: Maqu) County in Kanlho (Ch: Gannan) TAP, Gansu Province.<sup>86</sup> He was subjected to various torture techniques, including the use of pain inducing medication. He was deprived of sleep and food. Interrogation officers used sharp-pointed objects such as toothpicks to repeatedly pierce and penetrate into the tops of his fingernails and cuticles. At the time of his death, Goshul Lobsang was unable to walk, eat or talk. He had been sentenced to 12 years in prison in December 2010. He was killed after less than three years in prison.

In 2014, Tibetans died in detention because they were denied medical care. Like death in detention, the only new aspect of the denial of medical treatments for Tibetan protesters in 2014 is its scale. In 2008, after three months of detention and torture, Pema Dorjee asked to be taken to a hospital. His captors responded that people like him who protested against the Chinese government did not need medical help.<sup>87</sup>

On 12 August 2014, in Kardze (Ch: Ganzi) TAP in Sichuan Province, police fired into a crowd of non-violent protesters.<sup>88</sup> After the protest, four wounded Tibetans were detained. They were denied medical treatment and died in detention.<sup>89</sup> Another Tibetan committed suicide during detention as a protest against the torture by the PRC authorities.<sup>90</sup>

The death of Tenzin Choedak, 33, a political prisoner at Chushur Prison near Lhasa city, on 5 December 2014 exposed the brutal and inhuman treatment suffered by Tibetans in various Chinese detention centres and prisons.<sup>91</sup> He died two days after he was released to his family on medical parole. When he was returned to his family all the bones in his feet were broken. This suggests that he may have been subjected to the falaka, or foot whipping, torture technique. The falaka involves beating the sole’s of the victim’s feet with a heavy cable or whatever else is available.<sup>92</sup> It causes extreme pain up the victim’s body and the feet to swell.<sup>93</sup> The technique was used in the PRC, the Middle East, and Romania.<sup>94</sup> Tenzin Choedak died after less than six years of his 15-year prison sentence. Before his detention, Tenzin Choedak was an employee of a European NGO affiliated with the Red Cross in Lhasa. After his release, he was physically emaciated and vomiting blood because of a brain injury.<sup>95</sup>

The use of torture to intimidate and force confessions out of suspects is an urgent human rights issue in the PRC. Less than four days before the death of Goshul Lobsang, a prominent Chinese human rights activist, Cao Shunli, died in a Chinese military hospital. Cao's brother Cao Yunli said his sister's body bore signs of mistreatment during police detention. Cao Shunli's arrest, torture, and death follow the same pattern as the deaths of Tibetans during detention. She had been detained for about five and a half months on obscure charges.<sup>96</sup> She disappeared in September 2013 when she was traveling to a training session on the UN human rights mechanisms. She reappeared in October 2013, when she was formally arrested and charged with "picking quarrels and provoking troubles." Before her detention, Cao Shunli was in poor health and during her detention she was denied medical care. On 20 February 2014, Cao Shunli was transferred to a military hospital in extremely critical condition. She received a medical parole on 27 February 2014 and died fifteen days later. Cao Shunli's story is emblematic of the widespread use of torture and other inhuman treatment in detention centres in the PRC.

III. Reducing Deaths in Detention

The deaths that occur in detention are avoidable. The actual death in detention is the last of a long list of human rights abuses inflicted upon the victim. To prevent these deaths the PRC needs to fulfil its international human rights obligations. Most importantly, the PRC must abolish the use of torture. Furthermore, the PRC must provide detainees with medical treatment. Medical paroles should be granted to detainees who are in a poor condition. Instead of being a tool of concealment, medical parole should be a tool of compassion.

Many known and unknown political prisoners continue to suffer extreme conditions and inhuman treatment in detention centres and prisons across Tibet. As a first, simple step toward real, verifiable reform, the PRC should release Tibetans before they die from their treatment during detention.

Although the current number of known detainees and prisoners across Tibet runs in thousands,<sup>97</sup> TCHRD has identified some political prisoners for immediate medical parole based on urgency of their cases. These Tibetans include Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, Khenpo Kartse, and Trulku Phurbu Tsing Rinpoche.

Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, 64, was renowned for his efforts to restore Tibetan culture and religion, his social welfare activities, and his statements condemning the PRC's repressive policies in Tibet. He was detained in April 2002 and sentenced to death in December 2002. Twelve years later, Tenzin Delek Rinpoche is forced to use a walking stick because of damage done to his feet in prison. He is being denied medical care for, among other things, a pre-existing heart condition.<sup>98</sup>

Khenpo Kartse (aka Khenpo Karma Tsewang) was detained at 1am on 7 December 2013. After his detention, thousands of local Tibetans staged a protest demanding an explanation for his detention. Sixteen monks were detained during the peaceful protest. The support shown to Khenpo Kartse reflected his position as a popular senior religious figure who was well respected for his social work and the promotion and protection of Tibetan language, culture and religion. During detention, Khenpo Kartse was denied medication necessary to treat his hepatitis, bronchitis, tuberculosis and other diseases. He was kept in a cell that went below freezing during the winter and given a starvation diet. By March 2014, his health had deteriorated. He suffered from a sharp pain in his back and was ejecting bloody sputum.

Trulku Phurbu Tsering Rinpoche was sentenced to eight years in prison for his suspected involvement in a non-violent protest in 2008. Phurbu Tsering Rinpoche's lawyers stated that his conviction lacked the necessary clarity and evidence and that he was framed. In 2014, a person visiting Mianyang prison near Chengdu saw Phurbu Tsering Rinpoche. Because of his mistreatment, including four days of torture and deteriorating health, Phurbu Tsering Rinpoche was emaciated and almost unrecognisable.<sup>99</sup>

These three prisoners represent only a small fraction of detainees in the PRC's prisons and detention facilities who will die if the PRC does not act. Releasing them, and those like them, on medical parole before they die will be a substantial first step toward preventing death in detention and fulfilling the PRC's international legal obligations.

FREEDOM OF ASSEMBLY

In 2014, the People's Republic of China (PRC) restricted the Tibetans' right to freedom of peaceful assembly. In Kardze (Ch: Ganzi) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture (TAP) in Sichuan Province, Chinese authorities used lethal force to suppress peaceful protesters. Tibetans that attempted to exercise their right to freedom of peaceful assembly by protesting mining operations were also subjected to severe and illegal restrictions. Similarly, Tibetans from Diru (Ch: Biru) County suffered under a crackdown at the hands of the Chinese authorities. These crackdowns are a continuation of a policy to repress peaceful protests without regard to the PRC's international legal obligations.

In 2014, the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) obtained evidence of the implementation of this policy during the 2008 Protests. TCHRD obtained official reports that listed 26, known and unknown, people killed during the protests.<sup>100</sup> These official reports, written by the medical department of the Lhasa Public Security Bureau at the behest of the Chinese government, show that at the very least, 15 people, including 11 known Tibetans, died of gunshot wounds and over 100 people were killed in Lhasa during the 2008 Protests.<sup>101</sup>

assembly is an attack on the fundamental human rights of Tibetans. The newly appointed UN Special Rapporteur for Freedom on Peaceful Assembly describes this as a fundamental right and necessary for the exercise of other human rights. The right to freedom of peaceful assembly is indispensable to build peaceful, prosperous, democratic societies.<sup>102</sup> This is accomplished by strengthening civil society's involvement in ensuring transparency, accountability, and, ultimately, good governance.<sup>103</sup>

I. Legal Standard

The right to freedom of peaceful assembly is universally recognized as a fundamental human right that the PRC is legally obligated to recognize, uphold, and protect. The right to freedom of peaceful assembly is especially important for two reasons. First, it is crucial to creating a tolerant and pluralistic society in which groups with different beliefs, practices, or policies can coexist peacefully.<sup>104</sup> Second, this right is interrelated with many other rights.<sup>105</sup> For example, the right to association assumes the active presence and participation of others for its realization.<sup>106</sup> As such, any restrictions on the freedom of association will also undermine the right to peaceful assembly. Such interdependence and interrelatedness with other rights makes the right to freedom of peaceful assembly a valuable indicator of a state's respect for the enjoyment of many other human rights.<sup>107</sup>

A. PRC's legal obligations

The right to freedom of peaceful assembly is recognized as a fundamental human right based on its inclusion in numerous multilateral international human rights treaties and the International Bill of Human Rights, which is comprised of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).

For example, Article 20(1) of the UDHR states, “[e]veryone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.” Similarly, Article 21 of the ICCPR says, “[t]he right of peaceful assembly shall be recognized.”

The PRC is obliged to follow international standards regarding the rights in the International Bill of Human Rights, including the right to freedom of association, because the rights contained in International Bill of Human Rights is customary international law. It is customary international law because both elements for the creation of customary international law, (1) consistent State practice and (2) the sense of a legal obligation, referred to as opinio juris, are fulfilled.

The international standards governing the right to freedom of peaceful assembly are also legally binding upon the PRC because it is a signatory to and has ratified numerous multi-lateral international treaties that recognize this right. For example, the PRC signed the ICCPR on 5 October 1998.<sup>108</sup> As a signatory, the PRC must not defeat the object and purpose of the ICCPR.<sup>109</sup>

Other notable international treaties that the PRC is a party to and recognize the right to freedom of peaceful assembly include: (1) the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, Articles 4, 5(viii) (acceded 29 December 1981)<sup>110</sup>; (2) the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, Article 7(c) (ratified 4 November 1980);<sup>111</sup> and (3) the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Article 15 (ratified 2 March 1992).<sup>112</sup>

Finally, in the PRC, right to freedom of peaceful assembly is guaranteed by the PRC Constitution as well. Article 35 of the PRC’s Constitution states, “Citizens of the People’s Republic of China enjoy freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, of association, of procession and of demonstration.”<sup>113</sup>

As such, the PRC has a legal obligation to recognize, uphold, and protect the Tibetan peoples’ fundamental human right to freedom of peaceful assembly. In 2014 it did not.

B. The Right to freedom of peaceful assembly

The right to freedom of peaceful assembly generally refers to the right of every person to hold and participate in a peaceful assembly.<sup>114</sup> This right also includes the right to be protected from undue influence<sup>115</sup> and provides protections for those who monitor peaceful assemblies.<sup>116</sup>

To fall within the scope of the right, an assembly

generally requires the presence of at least two persons in a public place for a common expressive purpose.<sup>117</sup> Nonetheless, an individual protester should also be afforded the same protections as those who gather as part of an assembly.<sup>118</sup>

However, it is important to note that only peaceful assemblies are protected.<sup>119</sup> The Office of Democratic Institutions and Human Rights<sup>120</sup> (ODIHR) of the Organization for the Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), consider a protest “peaceful” if organizers have “professed peaceful intentions and the conduct of the assembly is non-violent.”<sup>121</sup> The ODIHR provides support, assistance and expertise to the 57 OSCE member States and civil society. Specifically, the ODIHR focuses on promoting human rights, democracy, the rule of law, tolerance, and non discrimination. This includes non-violent conduct that may be inconvenient, annoying or offensive.<sup>122</sup>

Because of the importance of the right, assemblies are presumed to be. The requirement of peacefulness is considered satisfied absent compelling and demonstrable evidence that the organizers or participants of an assembly, themselves, intend to use, advocate, or incite imminent violence.<sup>123</sup> Once peacefulness is satisfied, the positive obligation of the State and State authorities to protect the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is triggered.<sup>124</sup>

The principle of non-discrimination also follows the right to freedom of peaceful assembly.<sup>125</sup> This means that this right is to be enjoyed by everyone, regardless of race, national origin, or political opinion.<sup>126</sup> At the same time, participation should be completely voluntary and uncoerced.<sup>127</sup>

The State has an obligation to not only refrain from interfering with the right but also to protect people who exercise it.<sup>128</sup> This also means that the State must ensure the right can be enjoyed in practice and is not subject to undue regulation.<sup>129</sup> Furthermore, “relevant authorities should assist individuals and groups who wish to assemble peacefully.”<sup>130</sup>

C. Lawful restrictions on the right to freedom of peaceful assembly

Although the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is a fundamental human right, it is not absolute. A State may legally impose some narrow restrictions on this right.<sup>131</sup> For example, most international treaties that address the right to freedom of peaceful assembly also include the following language:

*No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of these rights other than those imposed in conformity with the law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, public order (ordre public), the protection of public health or morals or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.*<sup>132</sup>

Some States appeal to the qualifications of the right to justify violations. However, inaccurately appealing to an exception cannot excuse a violation of the right. For example, the ODIHR states that the inherent imprecision of the term, “public order,” must not be exploited to justify the prohibition or dispersal of peaceful assemblies.<sup>133</sup>

“Neither a hypothetical risk nor the presence of a hostile audience are legitimate grounds for prohibiting a peaceful assembly.”<sup>134</sup> Even when there is compelling and demonstrable evidence that the participants will use or incite imminent lawlessness, organizers of the assembly must be given a fair opportunity to rebut this evidence with evidence of their own.<sup>135</sup>

The ODIHR also states that “public safety” may justify restrictions in limited circumstances but authorities should not rely on such reasoning to pre-emptively break up peaceful assemblies.<sup>136</sup> Finally, it also states that “national security” is often too wide an interpretation in relation to freedom of assembly and cites Article 30 of the Siracusa Principles on the Limitation and Derogation of Provisions, which provide an authoritative interpretation of the permissible limitations to rights in the ICCPR. Article 30 states that national security “cannot be invoked as a reason for imposing limitations to prevent merely local or relatively isolated threats to law and order.”<sup>137</sup>

Ultimately, both the ODIHR and the UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and of Association agree that a restriction to the right of freedom of peaceful assembly must undergo a high level of scrutiny in order to be permissible. A restriction on the right to freedom of assembly is only justified if three elements are met. First, the restriction must be based on a permissible limitation in the treaty language and if the restriction is content based it is only permissible to prevent imminent violence. Second, the restriction must be provided for by a law and proportionate. Third, the restriction must be necessary in a democratic society.<sup>138</sup>

The first requirement for a permissible restriction is that the restriction be based on the treaty language. This means that it must be in the interest of national security, public safety, public order, the protection of public health or morals, or to protect the rights and freedoms of others.<sup>139</sup> These exceptions are very narrowly interpreted. Additionally, if the restriction sought is a content-based restriction, it should only be imposed if there is a threat of imminent violence.<sup>140</sup> If the restriction is only meant to effect the time, place, or manner of the assembly, then it is generally more permissible as a safeguard from those exercising their right to freedom of peaceful assembly from unreasonably interfering with the rights and freedoms of other people.<sup>141</sup> However, reasonable alternatives must be offered and any such alternative must be one that allows the message of the protest to remain within the “sight and sound” of its target audience.

Next the restriction must be in conformity with the law and proportionate. The law used to restrict the right to freedom of peaceful assembly must conform to international standards.<sup>142</sup> As such, the principle of legality is directly tied to the idea of foreseeability: the law must be sufficiently precise to enable an individual to assess whether or not their conduct is in breach of the law.<sup>143</sup>

Not only must the restriction have a legal basis, it must also be proportional. The principle of proportionality requires States balance the nature and extent of the interference with the reason for interfering.<sup>144</sup> The restriction should be narrowly tailored to cover only the purposes that justify it and to meet the specific aims pursued by authorities.<sup>145</sup> Furthermore, the least intrusive means of achieving the legitimate objective should always be given preference.<sup>146</sup> The ultimate aim of the principle of proportionality requires that authorities do not fundamentally alter the character of an event. As such, proportionality is intrinsically tied to the idea of necessity. This means that any reasons used to support a claim that suggested restrictions are proportional must be relevant, sufficient, convincing, compelling, and based on an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts; mere suspicions or presumptions will not suffice.<sup>147</sup>

The final requirement is that the restriction must be necessary in a democratic society. The UN Special Rapporteur on the Rights to Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and of Association, Maina Kiai, further stated that this required States not impair the essence of the right.<sup>148</sup> This recognizes that the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is indispensable for civil society and good governance and that any restriction must facilitate transparency and accountability—not restrict it.<sup>149</sup>

Thus, although the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is not an absolute right and is subject to state imposed restrictions, these restrictions must undergo a high threshold of scrutiny in order to be permissible.

II. Tibet in 2014

From the violent suppression of peaceful protests throughout Tibetan regions to the Diru county crackdown, 2014 has been a year in which the PRC's policies and practices continued to violate Tibetans' right to freedom of peaceful assembly.

A. Kardze TAP: Lethal force used to suppress protests

In the late evening of 11 August 2014, Wangdak, a village leader in Denma Shugpa, was taken from his home by local police officers.<sup>150</sup> Denma

Shugpa village is located in Loshu (Ch: Luoxu) Township, Sershul (Ch: Shiqu) County, Kardze (Ch: Ganzi) TAP, Sichuan Province. Wangdak, 45, is a widely respected village leader who had advocated for Tibetans to be allowed to observe the Denma Horse Festival.<sup>151</sup> Previously, Wangdak voiced strong complaints to authorities over the harassment of Tibetan women by senior Chinese officials at a cultural performance the local community was forced to host during their visit.<sup>152</sup> The Chinese officials detained Wangdak on the pretence that he held the horse festival without their permission.<sup>153</sup>

The next day, 12 August 2014, over a hundred Tibetans of Sershul County gathered to peacefully protest Wangdak's detention. They shouted slogans and raised their thumbs up in the air, a symbolic gesture of begging.<sup>154</sup> Chinese paramilitary forces soon moved in to disperse the crowd of peaceful protesters.<sup>155</sup> The paramilitary forces fired tear gas and live ammunition into the crowd, seriously injuring at least 10 protesters and detaining many more.<sup>156</sup>

As a result, at least five protesters died in detention from their gunshot wounds. Another detained protester committed suicide in protest against

B. Anti-mining protests

Throughout 2013, the suppression of anti-mining protests throughout the Tibetan region escalated. Protests against mining operations continued throughout Tibet in 2014. In May 2014 Chinese officials beat and detained Tibetans protesting Chinese mining operations in Chamdo (Ch: Qamdo) Prefecture, TAR.<sup>171</sup> The detained Tibetans were held in a detention centre without food.<sup>172</sup> Before resorting to protests, the local Tibetan residents had tried submitting a petition against the construction of roads to excavation sites.<sup>173</sup> The Tibetans were told that any resistance to mining operations would result in “violent punishments.”<sup>174</sup> About 30 Tibetans were detained.<sup>175</sup> Among the 30 were the two people who volunteered to deliver the petition to the central government. In detention they received minimal food for 20 days.<sup>176</sup>

Around the same time, Tenzin Lhundrup, a senior monk of Gom Gonsar Monastery near Shagchu (Ch: Xiaqu) town, was detained in Diru County.<sup>177</sup> He had been under the Chinese radar ever since he spearheaded local opposition to Chinese mining operations at Naghla Dzamba Mountain the previous year.<sup>178</sup>

The protesters were also protesting the use of explosives, which damaged the nearby homes.<sup>180</sup> Of the 27 protesters initially detained, four were accused of being the “ringleaders.” These four remain in incommunicado detention.<sup>181</sup>

Later in June, Tibetan women from Mata village, in Dechen (Ch: Diqing) TAP, Yunnan Province, were attacked and beaten by Chinese police after they had gathered to protest copper mining on religious sites.<sup>182</sup> Some men who joined the protest were later taken away and detained.<sup>183</sup> Previous appeals by Tibetan residents of the area had been dismissed.<sup>184</sup> Police warned that more severe punishments would result if protests continue, specifically that they had been given orders to “kill, if necessary.”<sup>185</sup>

The suppression of anti-mining protests took a turn for the worse in August 2014 when Chinese forces opened fire on a group of Tibetans protesting mining operations in Tsang Tobgyal township, Shigatse (Ch: Rikaze) Prefecture, TAR.<sup>186</sup> Thirteen protesters, including a pregnant woman, suffered injuries due to gunshot wounds.<sup>187</sup>

However, not all anti-mining protests were unsuccessful. By October 2014, the Chinese government declared that lands in Dzatoe (Ch: Zaduo) County, Jyekundo (Ch: Yushu)

C. Crackdown in Diru County

The Chinese government considers Diru County a politically unstable area from which unrest, if left unchecked, may spread to other Tibetan regions.<sup>192</sup> As such, Diru County, in particular, has been the target of an extensive Chinese crackdown. Diru County first became a target for Chinese repression in 2006, when local Tibetans responded to a call by the Dalai Lama to abandon the wearing of animal furs and travelled to Lhasa to pray the Dalai Lama's long life. Since 2009, Diru has had more self-immolation protests challenging Beijing's rule than any other area in TAR.<sup>193</sup> These self-immolation protests in Diru County have undermined the TAR leadership's claim that no self-immolation occurred in TAR. Then, during the second half of 2013 and this year, protests and violent suppression of protests has escalated in Diru County resulting in a further crackdown in the region.

Since 8 July 2013, PRC authorities began implementing the party's "adhering to mass line and building harmony" campaign in Diru County and the surrounding Nagchu (Ch: Naqu)

The forced display of the national flag has been a particularly contentious policy. On 27 September 2013, thousands of government officials and workers arrived in Nagchu and forced residents to raise the Chinese national flag above their residences.<sup>196</sup> The next day, residents of the Mowa and Monchen villages<sup>197</sup> protested the policy by throwing the flags into a river.<sup>198</sup> The People's Armed Police (PAP) opened fire on the villagers using anti-riot projectiles, leading to an open confrontation.<sup>199</sup> Ultimately, the PAP officers beat and detained at least 40 Mowa villagers who appealed against the forceful suppression of the protests, including Tsering Gyaltsen, who was hospitalized.<sup>200</sup>

The next month, October 2013, PRC officials detained Dorje Dragtsal for participating in the protests against compulsory flag display.<sup>201</sup> He reportedly had been "especially vocal" in disapproving political education campaigns.<sup>202</sup> Then local Tibetans from Dathang Township defied official orders and called for Dorje

By the end of December 2013, over 1,000 Tibetans had been detained in Diru since the start of the September crackdown just over three months earlier. Among the detained were three young Tibetans who were suspected of burning the PRC flag during a protest.<sup>207</sup>

In January 2014, Chinese paramilitary police targeted three Diru monasteries. They surrounded Drongna Monastery, Tarmoe Monastery, and Rabten Monastery for weeks. Eventually, all three monasteries were closed.<sup>208</sup> The police were assigned there to enforce political re-education programs and screen for dissident monks.<sup>209</sup> In the months before the Drongna monastery was closed its head instructor and the principle chant master were detained.<sup>210</sup> The chant master, Thardoe Gyaltsen was sentenced to 18 years imprisonment. The reason for the long prison sentence remains unclear.<sup>211</sup> It is believed that he was targeted for

In March 2014, the families of Tsultrim Gyaltzen and Yulgylal were informed that Tsultrim Gyaltzen and Yulgylal had been sentenced to 13 and 10 years imprisonment respectively on 28 October 2013 for their involvement in resisting the Chinese national flag campaign. It was the first news the families had since Tsultrim Gyaltzen and Yulgylal were arrested approximately six months earlier.<sup>213</sup> Many Tibetans from Tengkhar and Rishing villages in Bomphin Township sent continual appeals to authorities for the two men's release.<sup>214</sup> This resulted in monetary fines and even detainment for those who sent the appeals.<sup>215</sup>

By mid-2014, PRC authorities showed no signs of slowing down their crackdown of Diru County. Instead, the Diru County crackdown escalated even further. For example, in July 2014, TCHRD received and translated the Tibetan version of a Diru County regulation imposing strict punishments for failure to abide by the regulation, which prohibits freedom of movement, speech, and religion.<sup>216</sup> This regulation was issued in addition to the continuing arrests and disappearances of Tibetans who protest Chinese policies (such as mining operations).<sup>217</sup>

Then in September, Chinese authorities doubled the amount of roadblocks on the road leading to Diru County and beat travellers who showed annoyance at the delay.<sup>218</sup> Sometimes they were also detained and forced to undergo 15-20 days of political re-education.<sup>219</sup> Other travellers were fined up to 7,000 yuan (US$1,141.11) when they were stopped.<sup>220</sup> If they could not afford to pay the fine, their driving license and other documents were seized.<sup>221</sup> Furthermore, Chinese authorities expanded a police detention centre at Tsamdo Township in Diru County in anticipation of further arrests of Diru residents who resisted forced displays of loyalty to Beijing.<sup>222</sup> Chinese authorities also forced Diru county residents to take part in a boycotted annual picnic festival, which had previously been halted by Diru residents after the wave of self-immolations swept through Tibet five years ago.<sup>223</sup> Chinese officials coerced residents into participating or risk being banned from collecting caterpillar fungus, a lucrative source of income for many Tibetans.<sup>224</sup>

In October 2014 Chinese authorities ordered the destruction of all recently built religious structures. This included all stupas, mani stones, and shrines built after 2010 and all retreat facilities built after November 2011.<sup>225</sup> They also ordered the expulsion of all monks 12 years old or younger, from their monasteries.<sup>226</sup> Families who refuse to take their children back risk being detained anywhere from 6 months to 3 years.<sup>227</sup>

Most recently, Ngawang Monlam, the headman of Ushung Village in Gyashoe Yangshok Township, in Diru County was detained and killed. He was killed on the orders of Secretary of the Diru County Party Committee.<sup>228</sup>

III. Violations of the right to freedom of peaceful assembly in Tibet

In 2014, the PRC systematically used violence to disperse peaceful protests. These tactics include firing live ammunition into crowds, beating protesters with batons, or using tear gas. Furthermore, arbitrary punishments, such as punishing family members, unlawful searches, detention, or torture, for participating in peaceful protests also violate Tibetans' fundamental human right to freedom of peaceful assembly. Because these restrictions are not supported by the treaty language, legality, proportionality, or necessary for a democratic society, they are not permissible restrictions to the right of freedom assembly. Therefore, in 2014, the PRC violated the right to freedom of peaceful assembly in Tibet.

A. Treaty Language

Any permissible restriction to the right of freedom of assembly must be one of the narrow justifications in Article 21 of the ICCPR. The most relevant of these narrow exceptions are public safety, national security, and public order. All of these restrictions should be interpreted strictly and in favour of the right.<sup>229</sup> None of these justifications allow the PRC's restriction on the right of freedom of assembly in Tibet.

For a threat to public safety to exist a protest must be violent. The public safety exception requires that the State intervene to protect people from physical harm or serious damage to their property.<sup>230</sup> This is only possible in the context of a violent protest. Accordingly, the ODIHR guidelines specifically state that the public safety exception "must not be exploited to justify the prohibition or dispersal of peaceful assemblies.”<sup>231</sup> The protests in Tibet are non-violent, for instance villagers raising their thumbs to signify begging.

229 UN Commission on Human Rights, The Siracusa Principles on the Limitation and Derogation Provisions in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Siracusa Principles), 28 September 1984, E/CN.4/1985/4, para. 3.

230 Siracusa Principles, para. 33.

The national security exception is equally inapplicable to the protests in Tibet. The ODIHR guidelines state that the exception is rarely applicable to peaceful gatherings.<sup>232</sup> This is because the term “national security” cannot be invoked as a reason for imposing limitations to prevent merely local or isolated threats to law and order.<sup>233</sup> Even in the case of Diru, where the PRC fears protests could spread from, the national security exception is inapplicable. This is because, as long as the protests remain non-violent, they cannot threaten the security of the PRC. Instead, as recognized by the UN General Assembly, among others, the exercise of the right of freedom of peaceful assembly—even during protests—strengthens a State.<sup>234</sup>

Public order includes the rules that are required for society to function, including respect for human rights.<sup>235</sup> Because this includes human rights, a restriction on the exercise of the freedom of peaceful assembly cannot automatically be considered a threat to public order. Furthermore, there must be some evidence that the non-violent protests is a threat to public order. However, as the consistent reprisals against Tibetan exercising the right to freedom of assembly demonstrate, protests are restricted merely because they are protests. Such a broad application of public order would create an exception so wide that it would render the rule meaningless.

Therefore, because the restrictions on the right of freedom of assembly cannot be justified as public safety, national security, or public order, the restrictions are impermissible for violating the treaty language.

B. Legality

For a restriction to be permissible it must fulfil the principle of legality. The principle of legality requires that any restriction have a legal basis that conforms to international standards.<sup>236</sup> This includes the law being sufficiently precise to enable an individual to assess whether or not his or her conduct is in breach of the law.<sup>237</sup>

The PRC does not provide explicit legal justification for its use of violence or arbitrary detention to suppress peaceful protests. Instead, it often denies using violence against protesters. One can examine the charges it raises against detained protesters in order to adduce what the PRC might claim as the “legal basis in law” for its suppression of peaceful assemblies. For example, protesters who are detained, subsequently charged, and incarcerated for their participation in peaceful protests, have been charged with “promoting separatism,”<sup>238</sup> “splittism,”<sup>239</sup> “creating social turmoil,”<sup>240</sup> or “committing actions against China’s constitution,”<sup>241</sup> among other charges. At least one protester was charged with “illegally gathering a crowd.”<sup>242</sup>

Under Part 2 (“Specific Provisions”) of the Chinese Criminal Code, the charges above most likely derive from either Chapter 1 (“Crimes of Endangering National Security”) or Chapter 6 (“Crimes of Disturbing Public Order”). For these laws to conform to international standard they must fulfil two elements: (1) foreseeability; and (2) the law must conform to international human rights standards. In the context of the Kardze protests, the anti-mining protests, and the Diru county crackdown, the legality prong of this analysis is not satisfied.

For example, in December 2013, three Tibetans were sentenced to up to 13 years in prison for their participation in anti-mining protests at Naghla Dzamba Mountain.<sup>243</sup> They were charged with “actions aimed at splitting Tibetan areas from China.”<sup>244</sup> Protesters are frequently accused of attempting to split the State and the law is notoriously vague.

Article 103 of the Chinese Criminal Code states in pertinent part,

Among those who organize, plot or carry out the scheme of splitting the State or undermining unity of the country, the ringleaders and the others who commit major crimes shall be sentenced

This law does not meet the foreseeability requirement. This language is not sufficiently precise to enable an individual to assess whether or not his or her conduct is in breach of the law. There is no explanation of what constitutes splitting the State or undermining the unity of the country. A participant in a peaceful assembly meant to protest mining operations would have no idea that their participation would be considered “splittism” from the language in Article 103. Thus, the arbitrary detention of the three Tibetans mentioned above solely for their participation in an otherwise peaceful anti-mining protest does not satisfy the legality prong of this analysis.

Another common law used to restrict the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is “illegally gathering a crowd.” In January 2014, a monk in Diru County, known for his advocacy for the preservation of Tibetan culture, was sentenced to 10 years imprisonment under the charge of “illegally gathering a crowd.” This charge most likely derives from Article 296 of the Chinese Criminal Code, which states in pertinent part,

Where an assembly, a procession or a demonstration is held with no application made in accordance with the provisions of law or no permission granted for the application or where it is held not in accordance with the time for start and stop, venue and routes permitted by the competent authorities, and the order of dismissal is disobeyed and public order seriously disrupted, the persons who are in charge and the persons who are directly responsible for the assembly, procession or demonstration shall be sentenced to fixed-term imprisonment of not more than five years...

By requiring organizers of an assembly to apply to the government for permission this law conflicts with international standards. According to ODIHR guidelines, “[a]s a fundamental right, freedom of assembly should be enjoyed without regulation insofar as is possible...and those wishing to assemble should not be required to obtain permission to do so...it is the responsibility of the state to put in place adequate mechanisms and procedures to ensure that the enjoyment of the freedom is practical and not unduly bureaucratic.”<sup>245</sup>

In a 2012 report to the UN General Assembly on the best practices with regards to the freedom of peaceful assembly, Kiai writes, “[t]he Special Rapporteur believes that the exercise of fundamental freedoms should not be subject to previous authorization by the authorities...but at most to a prior notification procedure, whose rationale is to allow the State authorities to facilitate the exercise of the right to freedom of peaceful assembly..."<sup>246</sup> The ODIHR guidelines and the Special Rapporteur's best practices together form an authoritative statements of the international standard. Article 296 of the Chinese Criminal Code violates that standard by expressively rejecting international human rights standards regarding the freedom of peaceful assembly. Therefore, legality requirement is not satisfied on this ground because the "legal basis in law" does not conform to international human rights standards.

C. Proportionality

Any restriction on the right to freedom of peaceful assembly must also be proportionate. When assessing the proportionality of a restriction, States must balance the nature and extent of the interference against the reason for interfering.<sup>247</sup> The extent of the interference should be narrowly tailored and only cover the purposes that justify it.<sup>248</sup> Furthermore, the least intrusive means should always be given preference.<sup>249</sup>

In Kardze peaceful protests were violently suppressed. PRC security officials opened fire using tear gas and live ammunition to disperse protesters who were advocating for the release of a respected village leaders by holding their thumbs up in the air, a symbolic gesture for begging.<sup>250</sup>

The balance between the interference and its

reason is disproportionate. Here, the government used lethal force to disperse an otherwise peaceful assembly of people holding their thumbs in the air. The PRC has not offered an official justification for the use of force. Any justification of proportionality must be 1) relevant and sufficient; 2) convincing and compelling; and 3) based on "an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts."<sup>251</sup> In Kardze, the PRC has not tried, and cannot, meet these criteria. Therefore, without a permissible justification, the use of lethal force to suppress the Kardze protests was disproportionate and a violation of Tibetans' right to freedom of peaceful assembly.

In Diru County, PRC security officials used similar force when they opened fire on a group of Tibetans protesting the crackdown on Diru forcing them to show loyalty to the PRC by flying the Chinese national flags from the roofs of their homes.<sup>252</sup> The next month, they detained one Tibetan man, Dorje Dragtsal, for his participation in the protests.<sup>253</sup> When local villagers gathered to protest for his release, security personnel responded with violence. At least 4 protesters were killed.<sup>254</sup>

The use of lethal force to disperse the protesting residents of Diru County is disproportionate for the same reasons as the Kardze protests. Like the Kardze protests, here, residents either gathered peacefully to protest forced displays of loyalty or for the release of their fellow protesters. Like the Kardze protests, there were no accusations of violence, nor was any compelling and demonstrable evidence put forth that imminent violence would result or that the participants intended to use violence. Therefore, the violent nature of the interference combined with the great extent to which the interference denied Tibetans' of Diru County their fundamental human right to freedom of peaceful assembly greatly outweighs any need for that interference.

The specific incidences analysed above are examples from 2014 of how the Tibetan people's fundamental human right to freedom of peaceful assembly was, not just restricted, but denied to them by the PRC in 2014.

D. Necessary in a Democratic Society

The final requirement to justify a restriction on the right to freedom of assembly is that the restriction be necessary in a democratic society. For a restriction to be necessary there must be address a pressing social need.<sup>255</sup> In the context of the three peaceful protests analysed above, there was no pressing social need for the use of deadly force on non-violent protesters. All of the protesters were peaceful. As such the State has a positive obligations to uphold and protect the right to freedom of peaceful assembly. Instead, the PRC arbitrarily detained participants. The detention of participants of a protest is only permissible in the most pressing situations, when failure to detain would result in the commission of serious criminal offenses.<sup>256</sup> The restrictions were not necessary and undermined democratic values in Tibet.

The right to freedom of assembly is necessary for good governance, transparency, and accountability. Rather than protect the right the PRC has undermined it. In doing so the PRC failed to fulfil its international legal obligations. The restrictions placed on the right to freedom of assembly in 2014 were not permitted by international law. The restrictions are not permissible under the treaty language, were not provided for by a law that conformed to international standards, were disproportionate, and not necessary for a democratic society. As a result, the restrictions violated the PRC's international legal commitments.

IV. Conclusion & Recommendations

The recently revealed facts about the violent suppression of the 2008 protests renew important questions about PRC's policies with regards to the suppression of peaceful assemblies in Tibet.

The examples analysed above about the violent suppression of anti-mining protests, Kardze protests, and the current crackdown in Diru county, serve not only as indicators of the current human rights situation in Tibet, but also as a microcosm of issues that have been pervading the life of Tibetans for many years.

These examples illustrate two important points. First, that current PRC policies and practices with regards to peaceful assembly suppression, such as the use of lethal force and arbitrary punishment, does not conform with international human rights standards and violates the PRC's legal obligations to recognize, uphold, and protect Tibetans' fundamental human right to freedom of peaceful assembly pursuant to numerous multi-lateral human rights treaties as well as its own constitution. Second, these examples show that the violation of Tibetans' right to freedom of peaceful assembly by PRC security officials is not only continuing with impunity, but also escalating without much international awareness.

Accordingly, the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy recommends that:

1. The PRC immediately conform its practices, with regards to peaceful assembly, to international human rights standards by referring to United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and of association, Maini Kiai's, report (21 May 2012) to the UN Human Rights Council on best practices.
2. The PRC immediately end its policy of

- allowing security officials, such as the People's Armed Police, to resort to lethal force to suppress peaceful assemblies. In particular, the PRC must immediately stop the practice of firing live ammunition into crowds of protesters as a means to disperse otherwise peaceful assemblies.
3. The PRC immediately end the practice of arbitrarily detaining protesters merely for their participation in peaceful assemblies.
  4. The PRC, instead of cracking down on peaceful protesters, crack down on government official corruption, focusing on government officers who regularly practice arbitrary detention and torture of peaceful protesters, pursuant to the Chinese Criminal Code, Part Two, Chapter 4 (“Crimes Infringing Upon Citizens’ Right of the Person and Democratic Rights”), Articles 237, 238, 245, 247, 248, and 251.
  5. Kiai send an urgent appeal to the PRC, urging it to not only conform its policies and practices to international human rights standards, but also to ratify the human rights treaties to which it is a State party and has yet to ratify, such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.
  6. Kiai renew his request for an invitation to conduct a fact-finding country visit to the PRC in order to assess the current situation in Tibet regarding the right to freedom of peaceful assembly.
- The international community assert more pressure on the PRC to conform its policies and practices to international human rights standards, to ratify the human rights treaties to which it is a State party and has yet to ratify, such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and to sign and ratify the human rights treaties that it is not currently a States' party to.

I. Expansion of Security State

In 2014, the People's Republic of China (PRC) substantially expanded the security state in Tibet. This included policies designed to place Tibetans under constant human and digital surveillance, promoting internal security officials, and building the infrastructure necessary to carry out and escalate the harsh policies.

The PRC considers maintaining stability in Tibet key to its overall stability. In Tibet, there have been various forms of popular non-violent resistance against the PRC's occupation since 1949. The PRC has uniformly responded by implementing repressive policies. This has reached the point where, according to a senior Chinese Communist Party (CCP) official, authorities in charge of Tibet believe they can only address Tibetan protests with increased investment and harsher policies.<sup>257</sup> Even as these policies fail to end Tibetan protests, hardliners within the PRC attempt to expand the security state and the repressive policies in Tibet.

Following the outbreak of widespread protests in 2008, the Chinese authorities drastically increased state measures and the militarization of Tibet. This resulted in arbitrary detentions and arrests, extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearances, restricted mobility, and heightened surveillance of Tibetans. The increase of the security state in Tibet became more pronounced after the selfimmolation protests began in 2009. The number of paramilitary forces tasked with suppressing protests has increased particularly in areas hit by self-immolation protests.

The expansion of the security state in Tibet has had two predictable results. First, human rights abuses perpetrated by the security state have increased. The PRC's police play a pivotal role in deaths in detention, collective punishment, the violation of the right to freedom of assembly, torture, and other human rights abuses in Tibet. Despite this, they also enjoy impunity.

Impunity for human rights abuses leads to the second result of the expansion of the security state—the security forces becomes more concerned with self-preservation both by maintaining impunity and by expanding their power, than with what is best for the State or people. Darius Rejali,<sup>258</sup> one of the foremost experts on torture, noted in a 2008 interview with the Carnegie Council, "organizations that torture and have regulated torture typically become less responsive to centralized authority. They simply become less accountable."<sup>259</sup>

The PRC's Public Security Bureau (PSB) officers have accumulated enormous powers in the past decades as 'stability maintenance' assumed a key position in the PRC. The police and armed forces such as the PSB and People's Armed Police (PAP) play a crucial role in developing and implementing 'stability maintenance' measures. The PRC's "decentralized Leninist policing system" allows party officials at all levels to control the police force in their region.<sup>260</sup> In 2014, the coercive leadership, including the PSB and PAP, saw repressive policies in Tibet come to fruition. They also began building the infrastructure to enable more repressive policies. This included not just the physical construction of infrastructure but also expanding funding for security services in Tibet.

A. Policies

In May and June 2014, anti-terror military drills including training sessions on combating self-immolation, protests, terrorism, and stability maintenance were held in Ngari (Ch: Ali) Prefecture in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and Kardze Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture (TAP) in Sichuan Province.<sup>261</sup> These large-scale anti-terror drills were an extension of a similar campaign in Xinjiang. They precipitated an escalation of security build-up and militarisation of the Tibetan plateau.

The escalation of security and military forces in Tibet is part of a larger policy that focuses on using repressive tactics that violate human rights in Tibet. Many of the harsh policies in place in Tibet in 2014 originated when Zhou Yongkang was the PRC's national security chief. Other policies are designed to ensure that coercive leaders in Tibet support the CCP. All of these policies are well funded by the PRC. These actions are the foundation that the human rights abuses and repressive policies in Tibet rely on.

1. The Legacy of Zhou Yongkang

Zhou Yongkang was a member of the Politburo

Standing Committee and the national security chief in 2006 when he created a number of domestic stability policies.<sup>262</sup> In 2014, Zhou Yongkang was expelled from the CCP, arrested, and accused of being "a thief, a bully, a philanderer and a traitor who disclosed state secrets."<sup>263</sup> Despite this, Zhou Yongkang's internal security policies are still being implemented.

Before Zhou Yongkang joined the Politburo Standing Committee, he was the Party Secretary of Sichuan Province.<sup>264</sup> In Sichuan, he adopted restrictive policies that blurred the line between legal and illegal police conduct. To implement these policies he increased the security state and oversaw burgeoning domestic security budget. These policies enabled the brutal crackdown on the 2008 protests in Tibet and the 2009 protests in Xinjiang. They also foreshadowed the nation-wide policies he would develop as the national security chief.

Zhou Yongkang's 2006 policies leaving a similar brutal legacy as those he implemented in Sichuan. In particular, the "Three Basics" Construction Project' (Ch: san ji gongcheng jianshe) has increased surveillance and repression in Tibet. It consists of three goals: 1) 'getting a firm grasp on basic levels' (Ch: zhua jiceng); 2) 'establishing a solid foundation' (Ch: da jiben) for basic-level police work; and 3) training hard on basic skills (Ch: ku lian jiben gong).<sup>265</sup> In 2009, the then-Ministry of Public Security executive vice-minister Yang Huanning summarised the work of 'Three Basics' program as, "sending people to the grassroots, allocating money to the grassroots level, and selecting cadres from the grassroots level.”<sup>266</sup>

The ‘Three Basics’ enable police and armed forces to penetrate deep into grassroots communities and villages to establish control and maintain stability. It was aimed at increasing the police presence at the most basic levels—streets and neighbourhoods in urban areas and villages or groups of villages in rural areas. In 2006, as part of another policy, the MPS announced its ‘Decision on Carrying Out the Strategy of Neighbourhood and Village Police Affairs’ that called for the establishment of new police units in neighbourhoods (Ch: shequ) and villages (Ch: nongcun) nation-wide. This was the first time that the PRC’s police power worked directly at the village, instead of the county, level.<sup>267</sup>

In addition to new policies designed to impose security more efficiently and more locally, the PRC has taken steps to institutionalise and prioritise the security services. At the Third Plenum in 2013, Xi Jinping announced the creation of a National Security Council (NSC) that he would chair. The NSC held its first meeting in April 2014. At the meeting the NSC announced that its role is to ensure both internal and external stability, which would lead to precondition for economic development.<sup>268</sup> The creation of the NSC reinforces the role of stability maintenance at the core of Beijing’s political priorities. The PRC’s foreign ministry spokesperson Qin Gang said that the purpose of the NSC was, among others, to “make terrorists, extremists and separatists nervous.”<sup>269</sup> The creation of the NSC at the highest echelons of power demonstrates the expanding network of government and party bureaucracies in stability maintenance work and the need to coordinate their activities through a centrally-commanded commission chaired by the PRC’s president.

2. Promoting Coercive Leaders in Tibet

To ensure that the CCP’s rule is not threatened, it incorporates the military and police leaders, collectively known as coercive leaders, into its core leadership team (Ch: lingdao banzi).<sup>270</sup> The PRC’s State Political Security Bureau (Ch: guojia zhengzhi baowei ju) is a replication of Stalin’s State Political Directorate, which later became the KGB.<sup>271</sup> Since the collapse of the Soviet Union and the former Soviet Republics gained independence, the police force in the PRC has increased dramatically. Between 1986 and 2006, the number of police in the PRC grew eight times faster than the population.<sup>272</sup> This is an alarming trend given that the unrestrained power enjoyed by the PRC’s security organisations enables the police to violate human rights with impunity. The creation of a culture of impunity allows torture and other human rights abuses to flourish.

In 2014, coercive leaders working in Tibet were promoted with the core leadership teams. First, in July, the commander and political commissar of the People’s Liberation Army in the TAR were given a rank higher than most other provincial-level military officers.<sup>273</sup> Then in October, the PRC’s Central Military Commission promoted the political commissar of the Armed Police Corps of the TAR to a position equal to that of a provincial or ministerial level.<sup>274</sup> These promotions increased the prestige and influence of the positions. This in turn underscored the importance the PRC places on security in Tibet. In particular, the promotion of the political commissar, whose job is to articulate party ideology among armed forces, above the commanding officer, asserted party control over security forces.

At the same time that the PRC is increasing the importance and prominence of security personnel in Tibet, it is also ensuring that all security personnel are ideologically pure. In November 2014, Global Times published a story stating that officials in the TAR who still sympathise with the Dalai Lama would be punished.<sup>275</sup>

3. Funding

In 2011, Human Rights Watch looked at the public security budget in Sichuan Province by prefecture.<sup>276</sup> The data revealed that in 2006 the PRC drastically increased its per capita spending on public security in Ngaba TAP and Kardze TAP. By 2009, the public security spending in Ngaba was five times higher than the average of the non-Tibetan parts of Sichuan Province.<sup>277</sup> This trend has not changed since 2009.

domestic security budget surpassed its external security budget. In 2013, the PRC's total public security budget was 769 billion yuan (US$124.8 billion), an increase of more than 67 billion yuan (about US$10.8 billion) from 2012. The PRC's public security budget from 2007 to 2012 in the TAR increased annually by 28% and in Xinjiang by 27%.<sup>278</sup> The brutal and systematic crackdown on the 2008 Tibetan protests coincided with the unprecedented rise in the PRC's domestic security budget that exceeded its national defence spending.<sup>279</sup>

According to the most recent official data, the PRC spends more per capita on public security in the TAR than in any other region or province. In 2012, the PRC spent 2008 yuan (US$322.90) per capita on public security in the TAR.<sup>280</sup> This was over 75% more than the per capita spending in the next highest region—Beijing. It was also 3.6 times higher than the national average of 552.77 yuan (US$88.89).<sup>281</sup>

B. Implementation

Since 2011, the Chinese authorities have implemented new security measures to maintain political stability in Tibet. The implementation of new repressive campaigns has proved particularly devastating for Tibetans and their ability to defend and exercise their human rights. In 2014, Tibetans felt the impact of these policies. However, some of the measures in Tibet are only beginning to be implemented. This suggests that the PRC intends to increase its repressive policies in the coming years.

In 2014, stability maintenance work in Tibet involved increased monitoring and surveillance, the construction of hundreds of new police posts and the stationing of thousands of officials and cadres in grassroots Tibetan communities. Campaigns such as the “Benefit the Masses, Solidify the Foundation” (Ch: qianji huimin), and “The Grid Management” system (Ch: wangge), as well as the development of permanent infrastructure and increased roadblocks and checkpoints are all part of the ‘stability maintenance’ work in Tibet.

1. ‘Benefit the Masses, Solidify the Foundations’

The former-deputy director of the TAR People’s Congress, Ma Zebi, said the ‘Solidify the Foundation’ campaign was “the largest and most extensive coverage” of the TAR by grassroots cadres since 1951.<sup>282</sup> By September 2013, two years after it was launched, the three-year campaign brought over 60,000 cadres to 5,459 villages and 1,877 monastic institutions in the TAR. Though specific numbers are not available, the campaign is also being implemented in other Tibetan autonomous areas such as Drango (Ch: Luhuo) County and

Ngaba (Ch: Aba) County in Sichuan Province.<sup>283</sup>

Ostensibly, the cadres stationed in Tibetan villages help villagers develop infrastructure, utilities, and libraries. However, in practice, cadres either work as village level party secretaries or as ‘work team’ cadres running political education campaigns and espionage. The cadres’ major responsibilities include increasing village party membership and party committees, intensifying village “social stability maintenance”, “deepening the struggle” against followers of the Dalai Lama, and “strengthening the management and education of monks and nuns.”<sup>284</sup> Also, in accordance with the “Six Ones” policy, cadres are expected to establish files on every monk and nun that includes detailed information on their family and personal background.<sup>285</sup>

In August 2013, shortly after armed police fired into a crowd of Tibetan worshippers in Tawu (Ch: Daofu) County in Sichuan Province, state media reported the implementation of five stability measures including grassroots cadre evaluation system, and the stationing of cadres in Tibetan villages and homes.<sup>286</sup>

2. Grid Management

In Tibetan towns and cities, China has implemented the ‘Grid’ Management system to increase the use of surveillance and repression of Tibetans. Designed to effectively uproot and crush problems before they are started, this system relies heavily on the collection of extensive information on ‘special’ and ‘problematic’ groups. The establishment of ‘convenience police posts’ (Ch: bianmin jingwu zhan) and the volunteer ‘Red Armband Patrols’ allow the government to constantly watch people and events in the affected Tibetan areas. With enough security personnel to constantly monitor the local population, as well as groups of volunteer ‘Red Armband Patrols,’ surveillance has become an activity not only for the police, but also for a large portion of society.

The Grid system is partly operated by locals who gather information on other locals with enough staff and personnel to constantly monitor people and event. The grid offices consist of civilians operating under the supervision of a CCP member who manages and controls operations.<sup>287</sup> The grid system divides the local community into small units, each unit consisting of five to ten households. This makes it easier to monitor every member of a household and usually includes the collection of information about locals by locals.

For example, in Shetongmon (Ch: Xietongmon) County in Shigatse Prefecture in TAR, each unit consists of ten households: one household with party members, three rich households, three moderately rich households and three poor households. The presence of a household with party members is aimed at ensuring stability within the unit.<sup>288</sup> Chinese state media reported that in each grid unit, unit inspectors are required to monitor and ‘educate’ a special group of people, such as youngsters, former political prisoners and others with political history. Each household should watch over activities of other households to fight challenges and create social stability. In particular, each unit should prevent protests and petitioning by a large group of families against the state development projects especially during relocation programs.<sup>289</sup>

3. Security Infrastructure

Alongside these campaigns, the Chinese authorities have increased the number of police stations and security offices in Tibet. Police stations are now being built near or inside monasteries. In 2014, security checkpoints also increased. Now there are checkpoints on almost every major highway and road in Tibet. By July 2012, the PRC had built 676 street-side “convenience police-posts” (Ch: bianmin jingwu zhan). In October 2014, a new 72-room PSB office was built near Muge Monastery at Zungchu (Ch: Songpan) County in Ngaba TAP, Sichuan Province. Monks are now required to receive permission from the PSB office for all their activities and to travel.<sup>290</sup> The PSB facility is believed to contain detention cells. The police station may also serve to house government workers sent to monitor monks and run political education sessions. Zungchu County has had several instances of restriction and coercion, with a Tibetan Language competition being cancelled and nomadic farmlands being forcibly seized to make way for hydropower projects.<sup>291</sup>

Tibetans who have attempted to assert their rights and resist the expansion of the security state have been attacked. In December 2014, Tibetans in Dzamthang (Ch: Rangtang) County in Ngaba TAP protested against being forced to sell their land, which is their only source of livelihood, so a police barracks could be built there. Four Tibetans were beaten including one who was hospitalised.<sup>292</sup>

The PRC is expanding a detention centre in Diru (Ch: Biru) County in Nagchu Prefecture in TAR. The detention centre will become a major prison for people who actively oppose the PRC and its policies.<sup>293</sup> For over a year, Tibetans in Diru County have protested against forced displays of patriotism and repressive policies.

4. Road Blocks and Checkpoints

Police are also using checkpoints to hinder travel. At best, the checkpoints are an inconvenience and increase travel times. However, the checkpoints are frequently used to restrict Tibetan's right to travel and to extort fines.<sup>294</sup> For example, there are eight checkpoints monitoring the 270km road between Nagchu County town and Diru County town in TAR.<sup>295</sup> At the checkpoints, all travel documents are checked and people who express annoyance are beaten and sometimes detained.<sup>296</sup> Stopping between checkpoints can result in a large fine or the revocation of driving licenses and other documents.

The growing number of controls over movements of Tibetans complements the policy of prohibiting Tibetans from traveling to or from the TAR. A less restrictive version of this policy was implemented after the 2008 protests. It became a total ban on after the twin self-immolation in May 2012 by two Tibetans from Amdo province in Lhasa.<sup>297</sup>

The increase in checkpoints in 2014 has expanded the prohibition on travel beyond the TAR. In some cases, the roadblocks have in effect prevented Tibetans from being able to travel. In 2014, Tibetans increasingly complained that even travelling for pilgrimages or study outside their hometowns have become harder as they are required to get written permission from five different government offices before they could travel. Travelling without these permits is nearly impossible due to the number of roadblock checkpoints manned by round the clock officers monitoring travellers and recording their details.

C. Conclusion

The consistent expansion of the security state in PRC particularly during former national security chief Zhou Yongkang's tenure and after the 2008 Olympics has led to the accumulation of unrestricted power in the hands of police and armed forces. This inevitably led to the violations of Tibetans' human rights. In the name of stability and development, mass mobilisation campaigns are implemented to identify and annihilate perceived political opposition to Chinese rule. The 'Solidify the Foundation' and Grid Management system are designed to expand the CCP's presence and control to the most basic level of governance in Tibet. The role of the public security and armed forces in ensuring the success of these campaigns is central to their stability maintenance work in Tibet. The PRC may spend a large amount of funds on developing Tibet but part of these funds go to stability maintenance work which continue to cause many Tibetans to unnecessarily suffer persecution and mistreatment simply for exercising their rights. One of the ironies of the PRC system is that Zhou Yongkang is being investigated for reasons that have nothing to do with his abuse of power during his tenure as the party secretary of Sichuan Province and the national security chief in Hu Jintao's cabinet.

II. Technology and the Right to Privacy

In 2014, digital communications in Tibet were frequently monitored, censored, or blocked. This happened while the international community renewed its commitment to the right to privacy. The People's Republic of China (PRC) used its control over digital communications to arrest people, disrupt communications around sensitive dates, and prevent recordings of teachings by the Dalai Lama from getting into Tibet.<sup>298</sup> The restrictions on digital communication violate Tibetan's right to privacy, which is protected by customary international law, Article 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), and Article 24 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

A. International Law

The right to privacy guarantees that people have an autonomous space where they can choose to interact with people free from unwanted intrusions by the government or other actors.<sup>299</sup> The right to privacy is interconnected with the right to freedom of expression. If people choose to communicate with each other, their communications must be private, secure, and, if they wish, anonymous.<sup>300</sup> Infringements on the right to privacy—undermining the privacy, security, and anonymity of communications—can limit people's willingness to speak about personal or controversial topics.<sup>301</sup>

In late 2013, the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution reaffirming the right to privacy. The resolution also requested the United Nation's High Commissioner for Human Rights to submit a report on the right to privacy.<sup>302</sup> The High Commissioner's report recognised that the right to privacy is universally recognized and must be protected in both law and practice.<sup>303</sup> Underscoring the indivisibility of human rights, the report also recognized that violating the right to privacy impacted other rights including freedom of expression, the right to seek, receive and impart information, and the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.<sup>304</sup> Some of these violations stemmed from the chilling effect surveillance had on communications.<sup>305</sup> Other violations, such as torture and arbitrary detention, occurred because of violations of the right to privacy.<sup>306</sup>

Like the right to freedom of peaceful assembly, the right to privacy is a qualified right meaning it may be justifiably restricted in some limited circumstances.<sup>307</sup> The Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) examined when the right to privacy may be violated and when those violations may be permissible limitations. The OHCHR determined that the right to privacy may be violated any time information was captured.<sup>308</sup> The capture of information is only permissible if the government can show that it was legitimate and that it was necessary and proportionate.<sup>309</sup>

Conduct is legitimate if it is neither unlawful nor arbitrary. Any restriction must be permitted by a pre-existing law that is clear and precise enough that people can determine when they could be subject to surveillance and by whom.<sup>310</sup> This law and any relevant interpretations of it must be publically available.<sup>311</sup> The law may never impair the essence of the right to privacy or other protected human rights.<sup>312</sup>

Even if the interference with the right to privacy is lawful, it must also be necessary and proportionate to achieving a legitimate objective. Though they are not listed explicitly, the legitimate objectives are limited to national security or public safety, public order, the protection of public health or morals, or the protection of the rights of others.<sup>313</sup> The limitation must be the least restrictive means of achieving the aim and it must be proportionate to the goal.<sup>314</sup> The PRC's restriction on the right to privacy fails every test.

B. Digital Surveillance in Tibet

In Tibet the right to privacy is not respected. Tibetans have been detained for possessing videos and writings that the PRC considers to be politically sensitive.<sup>315</sup> In the days before the Dalai Lama's birthday, officials blocked access to social media sites, such as WeChat, and limited telephone and other means of communication.<sup>316</sup> These restrictions impacted people's rights to privacy, expression, and communication. When communications were not blocked they were closely monitored.<sup>317</sup> In at least one case, the violation of a monk's right to privacy led to his detention and death. Tashi Paljor, 34, was detained for possessing politically sensitive writings and videos. He was beaten and tortured during his detention. He died after less than a week in detention.<sup>318</sup>

The monitoring or blocking of communications restricts Tibetans right to privacy. These restrictions cannot be justified by the PRC as either legitimate or necessary and proportionate. As a result, they violate international law.

1. Legitimate

In the PRC the laws violate fundamental human right protections and are rarely clear.<sup>319</sup> Even though many of the PRC's laws are publically available they are written and applied broadly. This leaves people unsure about when certain conduct is prohibited. In terms of Internet censorship, companies that are required under the PRC's law to censor results but are not told exactly what to censor. As a result companies try to determine what terms are prohibited by trial and error.<sup>320</sup> This usually results in businesses over-restricting search results. For example, in 2014, GreatFire.org, an NGO that works to determine the extent of Internet censorship in the PRC, found that Bing, a search engine run by Microsoft, was censoring results more than Chinese owned search engines.<sup>321</sup> Microsoft responded to this information by censoring less results.<sup>322</sup> Given Microsoft's reaction, it appears that Microsoft could not determine what terms were prohibited and was forced to guess. This means that the law lacked the required clarity and specificity.

When individuals are punished for violating the PRC's laws regarding the use of technology the underlying reasoning often remains unclear. For example, two Tibetans were sentenced to five and seven years in prison for sharing a photo with text they added on WeChat.<sup>323</sup> They were charged with using the Internet to defame people by sharing the photos to a 15-member WeChat group.<sup>324</sup> Without explanation the court determined that the two Tibetans were criminally responsible for the photo being shared outside of the initial WeChat group and the subsequent petitioning and an unexplained incident.<sup>325</sup>

In both cases, the ambiguity in the PRC's laws has been used to further justify repression of human rights. The fundamental question regarding the vague laws is not whether they violate human rights, including the right to privacy and the right to freedom of speech, but how broad and severe the restriction will be. Particularly with politically sensitive issues, corporations and courts will restrict rights more than necessary rather than risk not going far enough and facing reprisals from the government. The consequence of this decision is imposed on individuals who are detained and tortured because they relied on their right to privacy. The laws that are used to justify the violations of the right to privacy are too vague and, therefore, illegal.

2. Necessary and proportionate

On 4 March 2014, police searched Lobsang Choejor's room in Drongsar Monastery in Pashoe (Ch: Basu) County, in Chamdo (Ch: Changdu) Prefecture in Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR).

324 Ibid.

325 Ibid.

During the search the police demanded to see Lobsang Choejor's cell phone. From their questions it was clear that the police knew what was on his phone and how he had used it. After the search, he was arrested for using his phone and WeChat to send information to contacts outside of the PRC and possessing teachings and talks by the Dalai Lama.<sup>326</sup>

It is not clear what the legal basis for monitoring Lobsang Choejor's communications was. However, even if there was a permissible legal basis for the violation of Lobsang Choejor's privacy the violation was not necessary. None of the enumerated justifications, such as national security or to protect the rights of others, could apply to possessing Buddhist teachings by the Dalai Lama. The surveillance of Lobsang Choejor lacks any permissible justification and, therefore, violated international law.

Days before Lobsang Choejor was detained, Tashi Paljor was detained for possessing political writings and videos on his cell phone.<sup>327</sup> Searching for and discovering these videos and writing violated Tashi Paljor's right to privacy. The writings and videos were protected by his right freedom of expression. However, Tashi Paljor was still detained and tortured.<sup>328</sup> His torture and killing were the last of a string of human rights violations that began with the violation of his right to privacy. It is difficult to access proportionality when there is no permissible harm that is being prevented. However, the treatment of Tashi Paljor, including his death, torture, and imprisonment in violation of international law, was unquestionably disproportionate.

The examples of Lobsang Choejor and Tashi Paljor demonstrate that the PRC violates the right to privacy without concern for the international law.

327 Ibid.

328 Ibid.

Even if the PRC had a publically available law that clearly defined when surveillance and monitoring was permissible, the use of the surveillance to arrest and even kill people is neither necessary to achieve a permissible objective nor proportionate. Therefore, the PRC is impermissibly infringing on the Tibetan's right to privacy and violating international law.

C. Conclusion

The expansion of the Internet and new means of communication has expanded people's sphere of privacy to include digital communications. This expansion has allowed people to exercise their right to freedom of expression and the right to seek and share ideas more broadly than before. When news came out that the United States was restricting the right to privacy as part of its wiretapping program, the international community rallied behind the right to privacy and reaffirmed its support for the principle.

Throughout all of this, the PRC has maintained a policy of restricting or simply ignoring the right to privacy. In Tibet, the right to privacy is restricted without any clear reference to the law. The restrictions are not justified by international human rights standards. Instead, the restrictions are designed to enable and perpetuate additional human rights violations, including torture and killing.

III. Religious Repression

In Tibet Buddhism is a fundamental part of Tibetan society and culture. The PRC views Buddhism as an obstacle to fully incorporating Tibet.<sup>329</sup> To a degree this perception is self-perpetuating. When an incident occurs the PRC accuses monastics—even if there is no evidence.<sup>330</sup> This provides the officials with somebody to blame and confirms their pre-existing belief that Tibetan Buddhism and the monasteries are behind unrest.

Because of the role of Buddhism and monasteries in Tibetan society, the PRC has attempted to at times undermine and at other times control monasteries. These contradictory efforts are best illustrated by the PRC's treatment of the Tibetan spiritual leader Dalai Lama. The PRC has denounced the hierarchical system with the Dalai Lama as the spiritual leader, saying it was responsible for driving thousands into poverty and slavery,<sup>331</sup> and simultaneously claims that the title "Dalai Lama" cannot end and that the PRC will appoint the 15th Dalai Lama.<sup>332</sup> These two approaches to Tibetan Buddhism are being implemented in the PRC. In 2014, the Chinese government emphasised undermining Tibetan Buddhism more than attempting to control it.

A. Undermining Tibetan Buddhism

The position of religion in the PRC has always been precarious. Despite Mao Zedong's attempts to become a religious figure and the absolute destruction during the Cultural Revolution, Buddhism remained a vital part of Tibetan Society.<sup>333</sup> Following the protests in 2008 and the self-immolation protests, the PRC revived the idea of replacing religion. In 2008 the Party Secretary for TAR declared that the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) should replace the Buddha.<sup>334</sup> The CCP is able to demonstrate its authority and power over Buddhism by using its coercive authority to undermine the structures of Buddhism.

<sup>329</sup> See e.g. Experts: "Theocracy has lost its root in Tibet," Xinhua, 11 April 2008, available at: http://news.xinhuanet.com/english/2008-04/11/content\_7960680.htm.

<sup>333</sup> Mao's legacy in Tibet, TCHRD, 27 Dec. 2014, available at: <http://www.tchrd.org/2013/12/maos-legacy-in-tibet/>.

In the PRC there are two main tactics for undermining Buddhism's role in society: 1) attacking the symbols; and 2) attacking the monastics. These attacks have become subtler than during the Cultural Revolution, when more than 6,000 monasteries were destroyed and over 500,000 monastics were forced out of their monasteries.<sup>335</sup> Now, instead of destroying monasteries, PRC officials close them. Instead, of targeting all monastics, the leadership and prominent figures are specifically imprisoned. These new tactics are more targeted but still destructive.

1. Symbols

In 2014, the most direct attacks on religious symbols in Tibet were directed at religious structures. In April 2014, 24 prayer wheels in Dzora Township in Matoe (Ch: Maduo) County in Golog (Ch: Guoluo) Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture (TAP) in Qinghai Province, were ordered to be destroyed. The prayer wheels were built outside the Central Health Heart Clinic and were dedicated to healing disease.<sup>336</sup> Officials claimed the prayer wheel, which was built four years earlier had political implications and must be taken down. Tibetans protested the authorities declaring religious objects illegal but could not stop the destruction of the prayer wheel.<sup>337</sup> At the same time, authorities threatened to open a nearby sacred mountain up for mining.<sup>338</sup>

In September, in response to sustained protests against forced displays of loyalty, authorities in Diru (Ch: Biru) County launched a "rectification and cleansing" campaign.<sup>339</sup> Part of the campaign was directly targeted at religious life in Diru

County. The campaign required that every stupa, shrine, and mound of mani stones built after 2010 be destroyed.<sup>340</sup> Like the destruction of the prayer wheel in Dzora, the destruction of religious objects was a targeted attack against religious symbols and belief. It is a manifestation of the PRC's attempts to dominate Buddhism in Tibet by undermining its structures.

2. *Imprisoning Leaders

The targeting of individual leaders in Tibet is another way the PRC attempts to undermine Tibetan Buddhism. The PRC targets both community leaders as well as religious leaders. Frequently, the two positions overlap. However, there is a trend in the PRC of imprisoning religious leaders as a means of targeting a monastery or community as a whole. Similar to how the destruction of religious structures in Diru was a punitive action taken against the entire community, the targeting of religious leaders is designed to punish the entire monastery and community. Unlike religious structures, the imprisoned religious leaders can be tortured, starved, and killed.

In August 2014, Trulku Phurbu Tsering Rinpoche was discovered in an emaciated condition. He was under suspicion after 80 nuns from his nunnery held a peaceful protest march. The nuns also remained loyal to the Dalai Lama and a life-long prayer ceremony (Tib: Tenshug) was held at the nunnery in 2002. The nuns opposed attempts to control Buddhism in the nunnery and refused to sign documents denouncing the Dalai Lama.<sup>341</sup> Shortly after Trulku Phurbu Tsering Rinpoche's arrest in 2008, the authorities launched a crackdown against the nunnery.<sup>342</sup> The authorities launched the crackdown when the nunnery was vulnerable after losing a leader.

342 Ibid.

The consequences of imprisoning prominent religious figures can extend beyond the religious community. Thardo Gyaltsen was sentenced to 18 years in prison in January 2014.<sup>343</sup> Like the arrest of Trulku Phurbu Tsing Rinpoche, the detention of Thardo Gyaltsen was part of a larger crackdown. Other monks in his monastery were forced to stop religious activities and shut down their monastic quarters. Some were also detained. Before his detention Thardo Gyaltsen was the chant master at Drong Na Monastery in Diru County. Locals believe he was targeted because he held classes on Tibetan language and culture at his monastery.<sup>344</sup> Approximately 300 students attended the classes before his arrest. The classes were open to the public.<sup>345</sup> They placed the monastery at the heart of the community and the preservation of Tibetan language and culture. By arresting Thardo Gyaltsen, the authorities sought to remove the monastery and religion from its central position in society.

Also in Diru County, Tenzin Lhundrup was central figure in the community when he was detained in May 2014.<sup>346</sup> At the Gom Gonsar Monastery, Tenzin Lhundrup was the head of prayer sessions and taught Buddhist philosophy to monks. On Wednesdays, to celebrate Lhakar, the ‘soul day’ of the Dalai Lama, he would help arbitrate disputes, advocate for vegetarianism, and give Buddhist teachings to local Tibetans.<sup>347</sup> He was detained on a Wednesday during a lecture on the status of Tibetan language and nationality.<sup>348</sup>

Once a religious leader is imprisoned the authorities work to ensure that he will lose his prominent position. For Tulku Trinley Rabten and others like him, this involves the death in detention.<sup>349</sup> However, that is not always the case. For example, Lodoe Rabsel was released from prison in May 2014. He had been the abbot of Karma Monastery in Karma (Ch: Gama) Township in Chamdo County, in Chamdo (Ch: Changdu) Prefecture in TAR.<sup>350</sup> Lodoe Rabsel was arrested after empty government buildings in the town near the monastery were damaged by explosives and set on fire. There was no evidence connecting Karma Monastery or Lodoe Rabsel to the attack but authorities still targeted the monastery. Lodoe Rabsel and two other monks were detained for helping the unknown perpetrators escape. With the monastery’s abbot in prison, the other monks, especially those studying Buddhist dialectics, were subjected to rigorous interrogations that lasted hours and ‘patriotic education classes.’<sup>351</sup>

When he was released, Lodoe Rabsel needed medical care. Instead, he was secretly detained for a week.<sup>352</sup> The authorities also prohibited him from wearing monastic robes, re-joining Karma Monastery, or resuming his religious practice.<sup>353</sup> Lodoe Rabsel’s arrest physically removed him from his monastery and was the first part of a crackdown against it. The prohibition against his resuming religious practice and the secret week-long detention were designed to ensure that he would never return to his position of prominence.

Unsurprisingly, the detention of religious leaders provokes calls from the local community for his release. When Khenpo Kartse, aka Khenpo Karma Tsewang, was detained thousands of local Tibetans staged a sit-in demanding a reason for his detention. Despite assurances from the Monastery Management Committee (MMC) only vague justifications have been offered.<sup>354</sup> During the protests 16 monks were detained. The last was released after over a month in detention on 21 January 2014.<sup>355</sup> The monks that petitioned for the release of Tsangyang Gyatso did not fare any better. After the Chant Master and presiding priest were detained on 17 March 2014 six monks petitioned for his release. The monks were released on 20 March severely beaten and too weak to stand.<sup>356</sup>

These attacks on religious leaders are designed to weaken religious institutions. The penalty imposed on the specific religious leader is designed to influence the victim's monastery and the broader community. The punishment serves to undermine the religious institutions without causing the total destruction of the Cultural Revolution.

B. Controlling Tibetan Buddhism

The PRC also attempts to control Buddhism. Instead of trying to remove or supplant Buddhism from society, the PRC attempts to use Tibetan Buddhism's prominent position in society to spread propaganda. This is done through a top-down approach, where the PRC control the leaders and the staff at monasteries, and through bottom-up approach that limits who can attend monasteries.

In Yushu TAP in Qinghai Province, the authorities began implementing a 2011 rule that placed the management of monasteries further under control of the government and the CCP.<sup>357</sup> This rule is the latest instance of the PRC tightening control over monasteries. It required that all monastic staff and management committee members be replaced with government and party appointees, without any input from the monks.<sup>358</sup> At other monasteries these rules implemented were in response to protests and self-immolations at the monasteries.<sup>359</sup>

The newly approved government and party leaders control the day-to-day management of the monastery.<sup>360</sup> They handle and oversee the administration of the monastery.<sup>361</sup> They also appoint religious instructors. Their primary purpose is to ensure that monasteries do not challenge the CCP or the PRC.<sup>362</sup> Since the rules for Monastery Management Committees were announced in 2011, the government has exerted similar control in over 1,780 monasteries in TAR alone.<sup>363</sup>

Another aspect of the “rectification and cleansing” campaign in Diru was that no monastery in Diru County could have monks under 13 years old.<sup>364</sup> A similar but broader policy was implemented in Nagchu (Ch: Naqu) Prefecture and Jomda (Ch: Jiangda) County in Chamdo Prefecture in TAR.<sup>365</sup> In Jomda, families were forced to write to relatives and tell them to leave their monasteries and come home. The returning monks and nuns needed the government’s permission to enrol in a local monastery. Local Tibetans did not expect the government to give permission.<sup>366</sup>

The recall of monks and nuns represents two policies designed to control monastic life. First, it controlled who could be a monastic. By preventing children from enrolling in monasteries, the PRC ensured that the only place for children to be educated was at government run schools that teach a government-sanctioned curriculum. According to official government policies, the purpose of education is to “fortify students’ faith and confidence in the Party’s leadership and the socialist system.”<sup>367</sup> Officials measure the education system’s success by determining whether graduates reject the Dalai Lama and accept the leadership of the CCP.<sup>368</sup> Second, it controlled the total number of monastics. It was designed to enforce the limits on how many monks or nuns could attend monasteries.

When combined these two policies could serve to dramatically shift the beliefs at monasteries. Forcing children to progress through government-sanctioned curriculum will make them more likely to trust government officials and the unchallenged control by the CCP.<sup>369</sup> Controlling the numbers of monastics helps the PRC ensure that people who do not follow the party line can be forced out on monasteries.

C. Conclusion

Despite the contradictions inherent in the PRC’s pursuit of both undermining and controlling Buddhism in Tibet, both policies were implemented in 2014. Sometimes these policies were implemented simultaneously. In 2014, the efforts to undermine Buddhism by the physical destruction of religious objects and the imprisonment of religious leaders had a more immediate consequence. However, the PRC’s efforts to control monasteries and religion in Tibet could have more substantial long-term consequences. Under both strategies, the undermining of religion and the control of religion severs the same end of replacing religious practice, which could threaten the CCP, with the CCP itself.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

I. PRC Census Data and Health and Education in Tibet

In 2014, TCHRD analysed the Sixth National Population Census of the People's Republic of China (2010) as it pertained to the current state of health and education within Tibetan. The national census is taken every ten years and reveals significant benchmarks regarding the ethnic make-up, health, education, and economic status of regional populations. This ambitious nationwide effort was heavily promoted by the central government, which spent approximately 700 million yuan (US$112.5 million) and mobilized over 6 million enumerators to visit over 400 million households to record a total of 1.34 billion people.<sup>370</sup> The data reveals a humanitarian crisis in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and Tibetan Autonomous Prefectures (TAPS). Independently and when compared to the rest of the People's Republic of China (PRC), the numbers are alarming. Both in terms of health and education Tibetan areas have the worst, or among the worst, indicators. In the TAR, the life expectancy is lower, the infant mortality rate is higher, children attend less school, and people are more likely to be illiterate than other parts of the PRC.

All state-sponsored censuses include inevitable pitfalls, such as underreporting, false reporting, and misleading questions. Despite its claims to objective data collection, the census promotes state-led projects in economic development, infrastructure building, and social planning. Much of the data is used to highlight "progress" in these areas, whereas many vital issues concerning social justice, equitable access to resources, and environmental degradation are largely overlooked.

Overall, TCHRD found that the 2010 census reveals extreme disparities between Tibetan populated regions and the rest of the PRC in regards to all major health and education indicators, such as life expectancy, infant mortality rates, illiteracy rates, and educational attainment. Despite the state's much touted "modernization and development" of Tibet, the government's official data shows Tibetans falling far behind the rest of the PRC in terms of health and education.

A. The 2010 China Census and Tibet

Chinese state officials promoted the census as a necessary tool for facilitating China's economic development and modernization, as captured in the widely publicized slogan, "Support the census with a smile; contribute to development with statistics."<sup>371</sup> Regarding Tibet, the official rationale for implementing the census further underscored its vital role in economic development and regional planning:

The goal of the 6th national population census is to measure the changes in population, demographic structure, and living conditions in Tibet since 2000. This will facilitate the economic planning and social development of the region in a scientific manner. This study will bring about sustainable strategies and scientifically accurate statistics for improving the material and cultural life of the people, to develop a peaceful Tibet, a harmonious Tibet, a prosperous Tibet.<sup>372</sup>

The census therefore serves as a social planning tool that will inform and legitimize future laws, policies, and development goals in the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and other Tibetan populated regions. A closer look at the census data will provide a telling picture of what the Chinese officials have prioritized in their lauded vision of a “peaceful, harmonious, and prosperous” Tibet. As the sections on health and education will show, the data is most detailed when it comes to economic growth, for example infrastructure building, personnel, facilities, and least detailed when it comes to indicators of social equity and the quality of services, such as access to resources, the financial costs of health and education, the distance to schools and hospitals.

Census takers faced significant challenges in implementing such a study in Tibetan populated areas. First of all, there are a great number of people on the move, including pastoral nomads, migrant workers, and displaced families who have been uprooted due to the state’s aggressive resettlement programs. This mobile population may be easily overlooked or misclassified by the census. Second, the spread of social unrest in Tibet since 2008 and 2009 has created a highly volatile and unstable environment for conducting the census. The government crackdown on protestors and the militarisation of the region may have deterred many residents from participating in the census. For those who did participate, there is little information on the circumstances of their participation, including whether or not answers were freely given, pressured, or coerced. These factors require us to view the census data with scepticism, especially in its claim to offer “scientifically accurate statistics.”

In the 2010 census, two key strategies are employed to prevent full access to information on Tibetans and other minority groups. First, the bulk of the published data is not aggregated for the different minority groups although this information was collected on all the forms. The only data that is specifically released for minority groups focuses on basic demographic information such as total population, gender ratios, education level, marriage status, employment status, and birth rates. The more telling indicators of health and education, such as life expectancy, infant mortality rates, elder health indicators, and illiteracy rates are not aggregated by minority groups but homogenized with the rest of the population and categorized by province and prefecture.

The census data was collected with the use of two forms, a “short form” and a “long form.” The vast majority of the participants answered the census “short form,” which includes 18 questions covering one’s personal identity, ethnicity, household registration (Ch: hukou), educational attainment, employment, and family composition. The census “long form” was filled out by 10% of all participants, who were chosen at random. The long form included all the short form items plus additional questions related to migration, economic activities, health, housing, and so forth. In the 2010 census publications released by the National Bureau of Statistics, which includes over 100 charts, only the following 10 are included with direct relevance to minority groups:

Short Form Data

- 1-6 Population by nationality and gender
- 2-1 Population by nationality, age, and gender
- 2-2 Population by nationality, gender, and education level (age 6 and up)
- 5-3 Population of mixed nationality households

Long Form Data

- 2-1 Population by nationality, gender, industry
- 2-2 Population by nationality, gender, profession

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

2-3 Population by nationality, gender, and unemployment

2-4 Population by nationality, gender, and marriage status (age 15 and up)

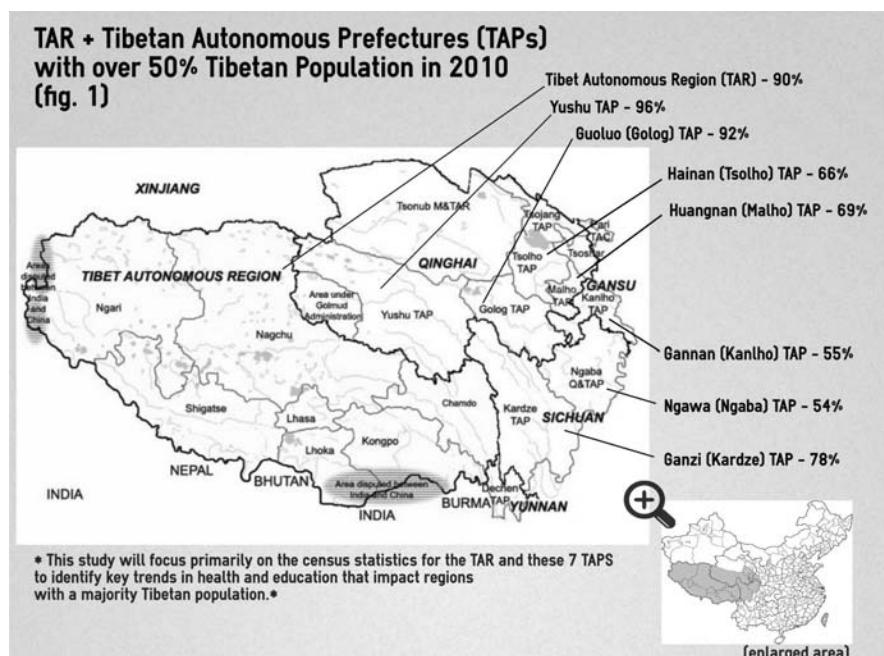

2-5 Population by nationality, birth parity, and number of women of childbearing age

2-6 Population by nationality, average number of live births, and average number of surviving children for women ages 15-64

The term “nationality” (Ch: minzu) is used to indicate the minority status of the respondent, which is a required category for completion on both the short and long forms. However, these published charts reflect a very limited set of data pertaining to nationality groups. The data on various health indicators and illiteracy are noticeably missing. Because Tibetans are spread across multiple provinces of the PRC, this hole in the data makes it very difficult to access how the information applies specifically to the Tibetan population. To supplement the limited data, TCHRD consulted additional studies such as provincial statistical yearbooks and previous census data, where stated collection strategies differed slightly from the 2010 version.

We also address the issue of limited, disaggregated minority data by examining the census results for the administrative regions with a majority population of 50% or more ethnic Tibetans. As the 2010 census provides detailed information on populations classified at the regional and prefectural level, it is possible to glean valuable information from sites with a Tibetan majority, including the TAR and the seven TAPS of Yushu, Guoluo, Hainan, Huangnan, Gannan, Ngawa, and Ganzi (fig. 1). In 2010, these combined areas included approximately 87% of all Tibetans living in the PRC. Although the census data for these areas does not separate Tibetans from non-Tibetans, this approach will give us the most accurate interpretation of the census as it pertains to communities with a Tibetan majority. It also gives us an understanding of regional differences when it comes to health and education in Tibet.

B. General Population Data

In 2010, the total population of Tibetans living in the PRC was 6,282,187, or 6.3 million people. This represents an increase of 866,166 people since the 2000 census, which recorded 5,416,021, or 5.4 million Tibetans. The 2010 regional breakdown shows (fig. 2) that more than half of all Tibetans are actually living outside the TAR. Only 43% of all Tibetans live inside the TAR the remainder are spread across four other provinces, with 24% in Sichuan, 23 % in Qinghai province, 7% in Gansu, 2% in Yunnan, and the remaining 1% scattered across the rest of the PRC. The 2010 sex ratio for the total Tibetan population is 101.08, with a slightly greater number of males (50.3%) compared to females (49.7%).

Source: 2000 and 2010 National Population Census of China, image copyright of TCHRD 2014.

Regarding the concentration of Tibetans in the different regions, the 2010 census shows a significant change in the TAR. The percentage of Tibetans living in the TAR dropped three percentage points from 93% in 2000 to 90% in 2010 (fig. 3). This represents a continuous decline since 1965, when the concentration of Tibetans inside the TAR was at 96%. At the same time, the percentage of Han Chinese increased two percentage points from 6% in 2000 to 8% in 2010. These statistics likely reflect the large-scale influx of Han Chinese into the TAR since 2000, as a result of state-sponsored relocation programs, migrant labour, and increased commerce and development in the TAR.

However, in the other regions considered by this study, the concentration of Tibetans fluctuated both upwards and downwards of the 2000 percentages. In Qinghai, Sichuan, and Gansu, the 2010 percentage of Tibetans remained approximately the same or slightly higher than 2000. A notable exception is in the Gannan TAP in Gansu, where the percentage of Tibetans increased significantly from 51% to 55%. These fluctuations may reflect the shifting demographics of Tibetans due to large-scale resettlement programs implemented in the TAPs. Overall, these numbers point to the declining concentration of Tibetans in the TAR rather than the outlying TAPs.

The 2010 census also sheds light on the rapid urbanization trends occurring in the Tibetan populated regions, with an overall increase of non-agricultural household registrations from 2000 -2010 (fig. 4). China's unique household registration system (Ch: hukou) assigns each citizen either agricultural (Ch: nongye) or nonagricultural (Ch: fei nongye) status. The increasing number of non-agricultural household registrations is a key indicator of urbanization occurring in a particular region. When an individual switches from agricultural to non-agricultural status, it involves surrendering land-use rights in the place of origin and may result in the loss of permission to have a second-child. We see a steady increase in non-agricultural registrations in the TAR, rising from 13% in 2000 to 15% in 2010. The most dramatic jump can be observed in the TAPs in Sichuan, where the number of non-agricultural households has surpassed the majority. Ngaba

TAP saw a rise from 19% in 2000 to 55% in 2010, whereas Ganzi TAP saw a rise from 15% in 2000 to 57% in 2010. More research is needed to determine the underlying causes of the rapid increase in non-agricultural household registrations for the Sichuan TAPs and how this is impacting Tibetan communities.

Another key indicator of urbanization is the percentage of urban residents (those living in cities and towns) out of the total population. In 2010, the TAR had the lowest percentage of urban residents in the PRC (22.67%), although this represents one of the highest jumps since the 1990 census. Sichuan and Yunnan also showed significant increases in the urban population, more than doubling the numbers recorded in 1990. This is comparable to the dramatic rise in urban residents for the PRC as a whole, which nearly doubled, from 26.44% in 1990 to 49.68% in 2010.

These census numbers reflect positively on the Chinese government's well-publicized efforts to increase urbanization and to spur economic development. By increasing urbanization, the state seeks to boost income levels, create domestic demand, and create a stable urban society under centralized command. The census includes many categories that measure this increasing urbanization, including statistics on occupied housing, rental rates, sources of livelihood, and vocational training. These categories underscore the burgeoning infrastructure building and economic activities tied to urbanization. However, they do not tell us much about the negative effects of urbanization, including environmental degradation, the impact on health, and the inequitable distribution of health and education resources.

It is also worth taking note of the shrinking average household size, a major trend that is closely tied to increasing urbanization and the effects of the one-child family policy. In all five provinces with large Tibetan populations the average household size decreased dramatically (fig. 5). In just 10 years, the average household size in the TAR shrank from 6.78 persons in 2000 to 4.23 persons in 2010. Without more research it is impossible to know how this impacts the social fabric in Tibet. Demographic scholars have emphasized the significance of examining household sizes when studying urbanization and poverty.<sup>373</sup> Although per capita incomes and assets may rise with urbanization and economic development, such numbers do not reflect the distribution of wealth in a population. In rural areas, larger families are able to cooperate with one another and make better use of the household incomes in comparison to smaller households.

In Tibetan rural and nomadic areas, the family is a "basic economic unit" that needs enough members to carry out essential activities in livestock care, agriculture, trade, and domestic labour. Households with more members also benefit from "sharing expenses, labour, security, and companionship."<sup>374</sup> For Tibetan populated regions, where family planning policies are generally more relaxed, the rapidly shrinking family size is an urgent issue that requires greater research if we are to understand the changing realities faced by Tibetan communities.

C. Health in Tibet

The 2010 census results reveal sharp inequalities between Tibet and the rest of the PRC when it comes to the health and wellness data. For all major health indicators, the TAR is consistently the worst of all the regions of the PRC. The TAR has the lowest average life expectancy, the highest rate of infant mortality, the lowest percentage of mothers and young children receiving health care, and one of the highest rates of chronic malnutrition among the young. Judging by the 2010 census data on health, the major state-led efforts to develop the inland provinces have raised the health care standards of many provinces to approximate the national average but not the TAR. This is clearly not for lack of financial resources. The state has invested heavily in “developing” the TAR, with government investment reaching US$3 billion in 2010, a 31% increase over 2008.<sup>375</sup> The skyrocketing investment growth visibly boosted the tourism and construction industries, but has not helped the TAR “catch up” with its inland neighbours in terms of life expectancy or access to health care.

1. Life Expectancy

Life expectancy is perhaps the strongest indicator of a region’s overall physical health and the population’s access to basic healthcare services. According to the official Major Figures of the 2010 Population Census, the average life expectancy has been improving across the PRC, with the 1990 national average of 68.55 years rising to 74.83 years in 2010. Large, developed cities have the highest life expectancies whereas rural areas have the lowest averages. In the official Chinese “fact guides” on Tibet, it is often cited that the life expectancy of Tibetans has increased dramatically Source: PRC Provincial Statistical Yearbooks, 2000, 2010, image copyright of TCHR, 2014.

“from 35.5 years in the 1950s to 67 years.”<sup>376</sup> In the rest of the PRC the average life expectancy was 35 years, equal to or a bit lower than in Tibet.<sup>377</sup> However, since then the life expectancy in the rest of the PRC has improved much faster than in TAR. Today, the life expectancy in the TAR lags nearly a decade behind the rest of the nation. Over the past 30 years, TAR has consistently scored the lowest life expectancy in all regions of the PRC: 59.64 years in 1990, 64.37 years in 2000, and 66.33 years in 2010. This data, which is drawn from the official statistical yearbooks, shows the TAR life expectancy slipping far behind the other inland provinces and the national average (fig. 6). With the PRC's standard retirement age of 50 or 55 for women and 60 for men, the average TAR resident will only live about a decade after retirement.

<sup>376</sup> This statistic is widely posted on Chinese embassy websites around the world, including the USA Chinese Embassy: <http://www.china-embassy.org/eng/zt/zgxz/t418918.htm>.

<sup>377</sup> Pengcheng Liu, Chngyue Li, Ying Wang, et al, “The impact of the major causes of death on life expectancy in China: a 60-year longitudinal study, BMC Public Health, 20 Nov. 2014, available at: <http://www.biomedcentral.com/1471-2458/14/1193>.

2. Infant Mortality

On the other end of the spectrum, the official data shows the TAR with an extremely high infant mortality rate (IMR) of 23.5%, the highest in all regions of the PRC (fig. 7). This shocking number means that nearly 1 in 4 Tibetan infants in the TAR are dying at birth. According to the state's 2010 report on population and family planning, the infant mortality rate refers to the percentage of fetal deaths that occur after 6 months of pregnancy and up to one week after the birth. When compared to other regions, TAR's IMR is more than double that of neighbouring Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan. It is nearly triple the national average IMR of 8.6%.

In fact, the TAR has one of the highest IMR in the world, attracting the attention of scholars and medical professionals around the world who have called on the PRC to address this humanitarian crisis. In a detailed study of rural Tibetan mothers in the TAR, the most common medical causes of infant mortality in rural Tibet include post-partum haemorrhage, sepsis, and obstructed labour.<sup>378</sup> A key factor in the high IMR in Tibet is the low percentage of pregnant mothers who seek professional medical treatment in local hospitals. Despite the increased number of hospitals in the TAR, Tibetan women face many barriers in accessing hospital services, including financial costs, the distance to hospitals, and the lack of trained medical staff and medical equipment in the hospitals.

Cultural barriers also prevent Tibetans from giving birth at a hospital. For example, women complained of communication difficulties, the belief that travelling to and from the hospital would cause pain and bleeding after the delivery, and the desire to protect the infants from strangers who might attract unwanted spirits or demons. Many interviewed women said that infants are particularly vulnerable to spirit attacks brought into their presence by strangers. These spirits, which ride on the backs of strangers without their knowledge, may bring harm or illness to the infant in their vicinity. These views of the spirit realm translate into rural women's suspicion of delivering in clinics and hospitals, or any place where there are many strangers.

Similarly, in the case of home deliveries, the Tibetan mothers rarely invite outsiders or trained birth attendants to provide assistance. In addition, "nearly all of our informants believed that the blood of childbirth is polluting. Therefore, they are reluctant to have birth helpers, who might be harmed by exposure to the blood of childbirth.”<sup>379</sup> For these reasons, family members also avoided cleaning the knife or whatever implement was used to cut the cord until after it has been used. These unsanitary practices raise the risk of infection and the spread of disease.

Such studies point to the need for health workers and agencies to work on overcoming both the practical and cultural barriers that prevent mothers from seeking medical assistance. Researchers have pointed to the need for health care workers to learn about traditional beliefs and behaviours in order to provide culturally sensitive and appropriate health care services to Tibetan families. Unfortunately, the emphasis on building more hospitals will not improve the situation as long as Tibetan mothers avoid using them.

3. Maternal Health

All the major indicators recorded for maternal health are also grim, providing some further clues to the high IMR. The 2010 China Population and Family Planning Yearbook indicated that only 33% of mothers in the TAR received systematic health care during pregnancy to guide them through the process of giving birth. This is far below the national average of 80%, which is also the approximate norm for the inland provinces neighbouring the TAR. The numbers for the TAR are slightly better if individual hospital visits are counted, with 66% of TAR mothers having at least one hospital visit before giving birth, and 55% having at least one hospital visit after giving birth. Nevertheless, these numbers are still the lowest in all other areas of the PRC.

In 2009, there were 35,740 recorded live births in the TAR, a number that includes all births regardless of whether the infant survived or not. Out of this total, about 52% of the mothers gave birth in a hospital and 6.5% suffered “high-risk” pregnancies accompanied by health complications. Mothers living in urban areas were 20% more likely to give birth in a hospital, compared to those living in rural areas. These percentages are significantly lower than neighbouring provinces and the national average (fig. 8). These troubling numbers signify a healthcare crisis in Tibet that requires urgent attention and care. In depth research and evaluation is needed to address the question of why the current health care system is failing to reach so many Tibetan mothers.

4. Child Healthcare

Not surprisingly, this negative trend extends from mothers to young children living in the TAR. In the PRC, young children in the TAR are the least likely to receive health care services (fig. 9). Only 41% of the children aged 7 and under and 43.5% of children aged 3 and under received health care in the TAR. The national average is over 75%. Neighbouring provinces such as Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan fare much better, with roughly 75% or more of the children (aged 7 and under) having received health care services in 2009.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

Only 41% of Tibetan children in the TAR have received health care services, the lowest percentage in the PRC.

Source: 2010 China Population and Family Planning Yearbook, image copyright of TCHRD, 2014.

While fewer children are receiving health care in the TAR, it appears that they also need it the most. As published by the state's 2010 China Population and Family Planning Yearbook, the TAR has one of the highest rates of malnourished children, with 3.6% of the children under 5 years old suffering from malnutrition. The only two places with a higher percentage are Yunnan (3.8%) and Guangxi (4%) (fig. 10).

Source: Sixth National Population Census of China 2010, image copyright of TCHRD, 2014.

Independent studies have shown that the high rate of malnutrition draws attention to a high prevalence of stunting among Tibetan children. In a survey taken in seven districts of the TAR in 1999, with a sample of 1655 children aged 3 and under, researchers found the prevalence of malnutrition for children was 39% for stunting, 23.7% for underweight, and 5.6% for wasting.<sup>380</sup> Rural children had slightly higher rates than urban children. The study concluded that "[for] Tibetan young children, the nutritional status of the entire population is poor and the prevalence of malnutrition is higher, especially for stunting."<sup>381</sup> Although malnutrition and stunting may be associated with living at high altitudes, the authors cite previous studies that show no such connection for Tibetans who have long adapted to high altitudes. Instead, they underscored the urban-rural divide and how "socioeconomic factors are playing a more and more important role in the growth of Tibetan children."<sup>382</sup> In other words, the chronic malnutrition of Tibetan children is not simply a result of the remote environment but an urgent social issue that could be addressed through better health care services and proper socioeconomic development.<sup>383</sup>

5. Elderly Health

With poor access to health care, high infant mortality rates, and chronic malnutrition, it is no surprise that the TAR has a low average life expectancy of 66 years. According to the 2010 census results, about 25% of the TAR's elderly population, aged 60-years-old and above, are still working in manual labour jobs (fig 11). Only 26% of the elderly population reported to be in "good health" and about 22% reported they were in "poor health, but living independently." Interestingly, the census does not provide a total figure for how many elders reported poor health, regardless of being able to live independently or dependently. It is likely that the number of those in poor health yet living independently would yield a much smaller number, thus concealing the actual number of elders in poor health.

Indicators of Elderly Health by Region, age 60 up, 2010, (fig. 11)

Region	Elderly Population (age 60 up)	Working Labor Jobs %	In Good Health %	In Poor Health But Living Independently %	Not Receiving Retirement Pensions %	Cannot Live Independently %

What the census says about elderly health:

- * Ngawa has the highest percentage of elders working labor jobs (27%) as well as the highest percentage of elders in GOOD health (41%).
- * Guoluo and Yushu have the POOREST elder health signs, lagging far behind other areas. Only 18% of elders in Guoluo and 11 % in Yushu reported good health.
- * The TAR has by far the highest number of elderly who are NOT receiving pensions (30%), whereas more than 90% in the other regions are receiving pensions.
- * The TAR also has the highest number of elders who cannot live independently (22%).

Source: Sixth National Population Census of China 2010, image copyright of TCHRD, 2014.

383 This argument is set forth by the following studies: Harris, N., Crawford, P., Yangzom, Y., Pinzo, L., Gyaltsen, P., and Hudes, M. "Nutritional and Health Status of Tibetan Children Living at High Altitudes" New England Journal of Medicine, v. 344, no. 5: 341-347 and Maberly, G. and Sullivan, K. (2001) "Alarming Facts about the Health and Nutrition of Children in Tibet" New England Journal of Medicine, v. 344, no. 5.

Outside of the TAR, the 2010 census provides data for the seven TAPS with a majority Tibetan population. Of the seven TAPS, Ngawa had the highest percentage of elders working in manual labour jobs (27%) as well as the highest percentage of elders in good health (41%). Further study is needed to see if there is a direct correlation between these numbers. Guoluo and Yushu had the worst elderly health indicators. Only 18% of the elderly population in Guoluo and 11% in Yushu reported good health. In Yushu, an area that was struck by a devastating earthquake in 2010 just months before the census was taken, 39% of the elderly reported being in "poor health but living independently."

The TAR had by far the highest percentage of elders (30%) who were not receiving retirement pensions, far higher than all the TAPS, which reported only 4-7 % of their elders living without pensions. The TAR also had a far higher percentage of elders (22%) who reported they "cannot live independently," compared to the TAPS that reported a much lower figure of 4-11 % of elders not able to live independently. These dramatic discrepancies help account for the low life expectancy in the TAR compared to the surrounding provinces of Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan. As is the case with the young, it is stunning to see the TAR falling so far behind its provincial neighbours when it comes to the health of its elderly population.

6. Hospitals and Doctors by Region

Between 2006 and 2010, the only region that saw a significant increase in hospitals and doctors was the TAR, which gained over 5,200 hospitals and 500 doctors (fig. 12). In all the TAPS the number of hospitals either remained the same or decreased. The rapid building of hospitals, roads, and schools is often celebrated as the proof of Tibet's successful development. It is also connected to the mass population transfer of Han workers to Tibet. It is troubling that this dramatic increase in hospitals has failed to raise the TAR's average life expectancy, infant mortality rates, malnutrition rates, and poor elderly health to match that of its neighbours and the national standard. This is an area that requires urgent research to uncover the true story of state-led development inside Tibet.

Between 2006–2010, the only region that saw a significant increase in hospitals and doctors was the TAR, where thousands of hospitals were built. But the number of beds and doctors per person in the TAR barely increased, with only 1 doctor and 3 beds serving 1000 people. Infrastructure building does not appear to boost healthcare services.

D. Education in Tibet

In 1986, the PRC passed a compulsory education law to make nine years of education mandatory for all children.<sup>384</sup> Students who successfully complete high school are then admitted to universities on the basis of their national exam scores. For almost 30 years, these programs successfully increased access to education across China and popularised higher education. The average years of schooling (AYS) increased from 6.8 years in 1996 to 8.3 years in 2008.<sup>385</sup> Its proponents have hailed the modern Chinese education system as a paradigm of educational equity. However, it has also attracted much criticism from researchers who point to the “education gap” between urban and rural children. The 2010 census and other state-led statistical studies make it possible to see the PRC’s official numbers on educational attainment, illiteracy, average years of schooling, and the growth of educational facilities and resources across different regions. As the charts below will show (figs. 13-19), there are undeniable inequalities in the PRC’s lauded education system, especially in TAR. On all major indicators of education, the TAR scores among the lowest in the PRC. For some indicators TAR is the lowest by a large margin.

1. Educational Attainment and Inequality

Education inequality is measured by the Gini coefficient, which measures the relative inequality of the schooling distribution, with higher numbers indicating a higher level of inequality. The AYS also serves as an indicator of education inequality, with more years indicating a better distribution of educational resources. In surveys conducted in 2000 and 2008, the TAR had the highest Gini coefficient of .4271 and a lowest AYS of 4.71 for 2008 (fig. 13). The neighbouring regions of Sichuan, Yunnan, Gansu, and Qinghai all perform much better than the TAR, with an AYS between 6.9 and 7.51. This data shows that despite the compulsory 9-year education “universally offered” in the PRC, the average Tibetan youth living in the TAR only receives 4 to 5 years of schooling (compared to the national average of 8.27 years).

Researchers have argued that such education gaps could be easily addressed if adequate government spending were dedicated to education. The PRC's educational investment remains about half that of other OECD countries, comprising less than 3% of GDP in most years, between 1990-2010.<sup>386</sup> Despite the strong evidence for the lack of education in rural areas, the PRC has given it minimal attention and not taken adequate action to decrease inequality.<sup>387</sup>

The educational disparities are apparent in the 2010 census results for the TAR and other Tibetan populated areas (fig. 14). In 2010, 37% of eligible school-aged children (ages 6 and up) in the TAR never attended school. This is a much higher percentage than the neighbouring areas of Qinghai (28%), Gansu (19%), Sichuan (28%) and Yunnan (16%). As a whole, the TAR and these inland provinces fare much worse than the PRC's national average of 5% of school-aged children who never attended school.

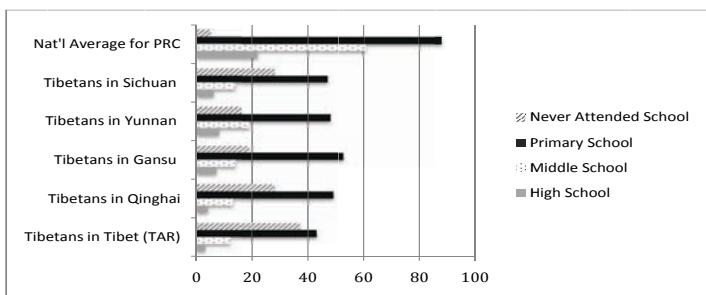

As children transition to middle school, the inequality is more pronounced. In an analysis of the 2000 census on school enrolment and graduation rates in the Western provinces of the PRC, including the TAR, researchers identified enrolment in middle school and high school as the two times when many youth leave the educational system.<sup>388</sup> This remained true in 2010, especially for the Tibetans living in the TAR, Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan. In all of these regions, less than 20% of Tibetan primary school students enrolled in middle school. The transition to high school is even more rare, with less than 5 % of Tibetan youth in the TAR, Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan making the transition.

Studies show that Tibetan students face many hurdles in making the transitions from primary school to middle school and onward, including the increasing use of Chinese as the primary medium of instruction, the lack of quality learning environments, the lack of relevancy to local cultures and economies, the long travel distance to the schools, and the lack of available jobs after graduation.<sup>389</sup> Most primary schools teach in both Tibetan and Chinese. However, the use of Chinese as the primary language of instruction dramatically increases after primary school. In most middle and high schools, all the courses are taught in Chinese with only one Tibetan language course included in the curriculum. Therefore, the students who enter middle and high school are more likely to perform poorly because of the language barrier.

In 2010, approximately 288,500 Tibetan students from the TAR, Qinghai, Sichuan, Gansu, and Yunnan attended university, college, or a post-secondary vocational school (less than 5% of the total school-aged population, age 6 and up). According to Chinese education researcher Ma Rong, most of these students are attending minority universities or universities in minority regions.<sup>390</sup> It is increasingly difficult for Tibetan high school graduates to enter top Chinese universities. Peking University, one of China's top universities, recruited only 37 Tibetan undergraduates, 13 masters students, and 4 PhDs between 2006-2010.<sup>391</sup> Furthermore, a study from 2004 found that universities outside the TAR admitted only 336 TAR students and of this number, 67% or 227 were ethnically Han.<sup>392</sup> These numbers show that Tibetan youth are very much disadvantaged when it comes to accessing education at all levels.

2. Gender Disparities

In the TAR and the seven Tibetan majority TAPS, the gender breakdown shows females are less likely to receive an education. According to the 2010 census, out of all the Tibetans who never attended school, 59% were female and 41% were male (fig.15). Tibetan females, especially those from rural areas, were far less likely to attend school compared with the males. For those Tibetans who attended primary school, 53% were male and 47% female. During the crucial jump to middle school, Tibetan boys also fared better: 58% of middle school students were male and only 42 % were female. For high school and post-secondary, the percentages level out a bit, hovering around 53% male and 47% female. These results show that Tibetan boys have a significant advantage over the girls when it comes to accessing education.

3. Illiteracy rates

With the low rates of educational attainment, it follows that illiteracy rates are also high in Tibetan populated regions. The 2010 census provides illiteracy rates at the regional and prefectural level for areas with a majority Tibetan population (fig. 16). The chart below, which is based only on those who are aged 15 years old and up, shows the TAR with the highest percentage of illiterate persons (32%) compared to the other seven TAPs. Huangnan and Ganzi also have high percentages in the 30% range. All other regions have significantly lower percentages of illiteracy, with the lowest recorded in Ngawa TAP of Sichuan (12%). In all regions, females are far more likely to be illiterate, comprising 57% or more of all illiterate people over 15 years old. These numbers are proportionate to the gender disparities in educational attainment

On a national level, the TAR has had the highest illiteracy rate in the PRC since 1990. Depending on the official publication released, the illiteracy rate fluctuates because of the method used to calculate it. The 2010 census lists the TAR's illiteracy rate at 32% because it counts only the population aged 15 and up but the Major Figures of the 2010 Population Census (a widely published summary of the census results) lists it at 24% because it takes this percentage out of the entire population.

(9%), Sichuan (5%), and Yunnan (6%).

Either way, the numbers cannot disguise the fact that the TAR has an extraordinarily high rate of illiteracy compared to its neighbours and the rest of the PRC. The comparative figure of the different regions (fig. 17) shows the TAR with an illiteracy rate that is 6 times that of the national average of 4%. The figure also shows the TAR's soaring illiteracy rate compared to its neighbours of Qinghai (10%), Gansu

4. Educational Facilities

A key revelation lies in the number of educational facilities that were built and closed in the TAR and other Tibetan-majority TAPS from 2006-2013 (fig. 18). Based on the statistical yearbook data for each region, we see dramatic fluctuations in the number of schools in each area. With the exception of kindergarten schools, most regions saw a sharp decline in the number of schools. On one hand, the state is expanding access to kindergarten, bringing Tibetan children into the educational system at a much younger age. Over 400 kindergarten schools were built in the TAR in the past 6 years. On the other hand, the shrinking number of elementary, middle, and high schools reflects the widespread closing of village schools, which are consolidated into large boarding schools located in townships and cities. This consolidation of schools forces young children to either travel long distances to attend school or to leave their families and live on campus to gain an education. Studies have shown that this strategy is widely used to encourage nomads to take on a sedentary lifestyle by moving them closer to towns and cities.<sup>393</sup>

Interestingly, the increase in the number of kindergartens does not always translate into better learning environments for young Tibetan children. For instance, in the TAR, there was a dramatic jump of 42 kindergartens in 2006 to 480 in 2013. With an increase of over 400 schools, the student to teacher ratio did not drop but actually rose from one teacher per 25 students in 2006 to one teacher per 39 students in 2013. This suggests that the new schools are poorly staffed to handle the increased volume of students. This trend holds true for Huangnan, Guoluo, and Yushu, all areas that saw a big jump in the number of kindergartens and kindergarten enrolment but not enough teachers to maintain a reasonable teacher-student ratio. The worst case is Guoluo, where one kindergarten teacher was available per 81 students in 2013.

Interestingly, in Ngawa and Ganzi TAPS in Sichuan, the increased number of kindergartens coincided with a sharp decline in student enrolment. For instance, Ngawa saw an increase from 27 to 64 kindergartens in the 6-year period, but a dramatic decline of 8,961 enrolled kindergarten students to just 729 students in 2013. A very similar trend is seen in Ganzi as well. Further research is needed to explain these dramatic regional differences.

During the 6-year period, a greater number of elementary schools were closed compared to middle schools or high schools. In Hainan TAP, 344 elementary schools declined to just 54. In Ngawa TAP, 1,195 elementary schools declined to 286. The closing of these schools did lead to a significant decline in the number of enrolled students. In Hainan, 51,000 elementary students declined to just over 45,000. In Ngawa, 99,000 enrolled elementary students declined to 75,000. More research is needed to verify if these missing children are simply opting out of elementary school or travelling elsewhere to receive an education. With the closing down of village schools, there are reports that some local Tibetan groups are forming community schools or informal vocational centres to educate their children.<sup>394</sup> These may not be counted in the census.

The decline in middle and high schools is less pronounced, but still significant. To continue with the above examples, Hainan had 42 middle and high schools in 2006, a number that was reduced to 19 in 2013. Unlike the trend with elementary schools, there was actually a slight increase of enrolled middle and high school students in Hainan. The same is true for Ngawa as well, which lost 9 middle and high schools despite an increase in enrolment. The only region that deviates from this trend is the TAR, which saw an increase of 4 middle and high schools, increased student enrolment, as well as improved student-teacher ratio.

These shifting numbers show that educational development and reorganization are happening on a large scale, with many regional differences at play. In-depth research at the prefectural level is needed to identify the key driving forces behind these changes. Scholars have pointed to the changing patterns of population mobility, the spread of mass protests since 2008, the controversial resettlement of the nomadic population, and state-led development projects as just a few of the driving social forces behind the restructuring of the educational system in Tibet.<sup>395</sup> The dramatic pace of change should sound an alarm, as these shifts will impact Tibetans for generations to come and it is highly unlikely that local needs and interests are being consulted in the process.

5. Worker Education levels

Education researchers have found that one of the primary reasons Tibetan families keep their children at home instead of sending them to school is the lack of suitable employment upon graduation.<sup>396</sup> If the children are sent to school, it is not certain that they will be employed upon graduation. At the same time, they are very much needed at home to carry out essential work for the family, such as caring for livestock, farming, or trading. Nomadic and rural families rely on the children to carry out tasks essential to the household economy. The 2010 census gives pertinent data on this issue as it identifies the education levels of workers in the region's major industries of agriculture and livestock. In the TAR, the vast majority of labourers in agriculture and livestock have not gained more than an elementary school education (fig. 19). For instance, the numbers show that the agriculture industry mostly hires those who have never attended school (30,852 labourers) or those with only an elementary school education (36,111 labourers) compared to just 232 individuals with post-secondary degrees. There are far fewer jobs for those with a middle school education or higher, as seen in the manufacturing, forestry, and mining industries.

E. Conclusion

The 2010 census reveals a two-sided picture that does not add up. On one hand, it reveals substantial increases in health and education infrastructure and personnel, such as a greater number of hospitals, doctors, schools, and teachers, especially in the TAR. On the other hand, it reveals strikingly disproportionate regional inequalities and the lack of improved access to basic health and education services. The TAR, in particular, lags far behind its neighbours and the PRC national averages on all major indicators of health and education, including life expectancy, maternal health, and child health. The TAR also has the highest rate of illiteracy in the PRC, with nearly a third of the adult population being illiterate.

What doesn't add up here is that the TAR data makes some of the biggest leaps in infrastructure building over the past 10 years compared to its neighbouring provinces of Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan. Literally hundreds of schools and thousands of hospitals were built in the TAR since 2000, far surpassing the health and education infrastructure building in the other provinces with large Tibetan populations. Yet despite these large-scale building projects, the 2010 census shows the

TAR nowhere near catching up with any of the inland provinces on the major indicators of health and education. Although there are improvements since 2000, it is still troubling how far behind the region falls when compared to the rest of the PRC.

The 2010 census data shows that the lauded campaigns for developing a peaceful and prosperous Tibet and billions of dollars in investment have not succeeded in providing the most fundamental needs in health and education enjoyed by the rest of the PRC, such as proper nutrition, access to health care, and basic literacy. We must also keep in mind that the 2010 census results likely paint a more positive picture than is actually the case on the ground.

The 2010 census results should sound an alarm. The severe lack of health care and education in the TAR amounts to a humanitarian crisis. With one of the highest infant mortality rates in the world and the low average life expectancy of 66 years old, it is undeniable that the current health development programs require re-evaluation. The rapid building of schools and hospitals does not appear to be transforming the situation for the better, especially considering that the neighbouring provinces are faring much better without similar development campaigns.

More in-depth research is urgently needed to identify the reasons behind such disparity. It would be useful to compare how government investments in health and education are spent across these inland provinces, including the distribution of resources and the training of key personnel. It would also be vital to identify the social and cultural barriers that are preventing Tibetans from accessing the most basic health and education services

1. Key Findings on Health in Tibet:

- In 2010, the TAR had the PRC's lowest average life expectancy at 66 years old, compared to the PRC's national average of 74 years old.
- In 2010, the TAR had an infant mortality rate of 23.5%, the highest in all regions of the PRC and more than twice as high as the neighbouring provinces.

- In 2010, only 33% of mothers in the TAR received systematic health care and 52% gave birth in a hospital.
- Young children in the TAR are the least likely to receive health care in the PRC. In 2010, less than half of TAR children aged 7 and under received healthcare, compared to the roughly 75% of children who received health care in Qinghai, Gansu, Sichuan, and Yunnan. The children of the TAR also suffer high rates of malnutrition and stunting.
- Between 17 -25% of elderly Tibetans (aged 60 and up) are still working in labour jobs in 2010. Ngawa has the highest percentage of elders reporting good health (41%) whereas Yushu has the lowest (11%). The TAR has by far, the highest percentage of elders who are not receiving retirement pensions (30%).
- Of all the Tibetan majority regions, only the TAR saw a substantial jump in the number of hospitals and doctors from 2006-2010. In just 4 years, over 5,200 hospitals were built and 500 doctors were hired. However, this did not improve the average number of hospital beds and doctors per person. In 2010, the TAR had only 3 hospital beds and 1 doctor per 1000 people.

2. Key Findings on Education in Tibet:

- In 2008, the TAR had the lowest average years of schooling per person at 4.71 years. The neighbouring provinces of Qinghai, Gansu, Yunnan, and Sichuan all had average years of schooling in the 7 year range. The national PRC average was 8 years.
- In 2010, compared to Tibetans living in Sichuan, Yunnan, Gansu, and Qinghai, Tibetans in the TAR had the highest percentage of those who never attended school, 37%. About half of all Tibetans in the TAR, Sichuan, Gansu, Qinghai, and Yunnan have attended primary school, but a much smaller percentage (between 12-19%) make the transition to middle school. Less than 5% of all Tibetans in these regions make it to high school or beyond.

- Tibetan males have a significant advantage over Tibetan females when it comes to accessing education. In 2010, out of those who never attended school, about 59% are female. At all levels of primary, middle, and high school, Tibetan males outnumber the Tibetan females.
- In 2010, the illiteracy rate in the TAR for those aged 15 years and up was 32%, the highest in the PRC. This is significantly higher than the illiteracy rates in the Tibetan majority TAPS, which range from 12% in Ngawa to 30% in Ganzi and Huangnan.
- With the exception of an increase in number of kindergarten schools, the TAR and the Tibetan majority TAPS saw a sharp decline in the number of elementary, middle, and high schools from 2006-2013. This is likely the result of closing down village schools, which have been consolidated into large boarding schools located in towns and cities.
- In the TAR, the largest industries of agriculture and livestock primarily hire workers who have never attended school or only attended elementary school. Thus it appears that students with a middle school education (or higher) have a smaller chance of finding suitable employment.

II. Education in Tibet

The PRC's 2010 census data on education in Tibet reveals that there are systemic and consistent problems with education in Tibet. The low number of Tibetans receiving an education and the high number of children dropping out of school is a problem that cannot be confined to a particular year or policy. In 2014, TCHRD published a special report discussing some of the causes and solutions to the poor of education system in Tibet.<sup>397</sup> There are many interrelated causes for these problems.

The problems are not insurmountable. Three of the main problems are: 1) the students cannot relate to the curriculum; Mandarin is increasingly used as the language of instruction, which makes it harder for Tibetans to learn; and 3) that the geography in Tibet makes centralized education system difficult. Both of these problems can be solved through relatively simple measures that have been tried and tested in other countries.

There are two main problems with the education system in Tibet: 1) the curriculum does not offer material children can relate to; and 2) the geography of Tibet makes it difficult to bring education to children.

A. Curriculum

The curriculum in Tibet is the product of an effort to control what children in Tibet think and believe. In some cases, the PRC's control over textbooks and curriculum has succeeded in convincing students to trust government officials and the CCP.<sup>398</sup> In Tibet, the curriculum has the effect of keeping children out of school. Because the curriculum rewrites Tibetan history and portrays Tibetan culture as barbaric parents are hesitant to send their children to school.<sup>399</sup>

In 2014, TCHRD obtained textbooks that are being used in Tibet. These textbooks confirm stories of how Tibetan culture is treated as barbaric<sup>400</sup> and students learn to be ashamed of their culture and traditions.<sup>401</sup> When compared with previous textbooks, they demonstrate that the PRC removes more aspects of Tibetan culture and history. Historical examples of Buddhism in Tibet or Tibetan achievements are edited or deleted, as the PRC perceives any reference to Tibetan Buddhism, the Dalai Lamas, or Tibetan nationalism as a threat.<sup>402</sup>

In many cases, the PRC removed references to Tibetan Buddhism because they view it as a threat to stability.<sup>403</sup> Textbooks from the 1980s discussed the Potala Palace's religious and political history and described the Dalai Lamas who lived there.<sup>404</sup> By 2003, these paragraphs were deleted. Tibetan historical figures have also been reinvented to fit the PRC's propaganda. In a current textbook there is an entire chapter that discusses Thangtong Gyalpo. The textbook describes Thangtong Gyalpo as a proponent of Marxism, despite the fact that he lived in the 14th century—approximately 500 years before Karl Marx was born. Thangtong Gyalpo's achievements that relate to Tibetan culture or religion are never mentioned. This includes his recognition as a Buddhist saint, his founding of Tibetan opera, and his work on Tibetan Buddhist mediation and medicine.<sup>405</sup> The textbook does mention Thangtong Gyalpo's suspension bridges, but omits that they were built to help travelling religious pilgrims.<sup>406</sup> Similarly, even though the Sakya Monastery is mentioned in the textbooks the monks who studied religious teachings are not.<sup>407</sup>

The textbooks do more than undermine the successes of Tibetans. Other parts of the textbooks portray Tibetan culture as backward and inferior. Particularly among nomads, there is a perception that the schools will teach children that their traditional way of life is inferior.<sup>408</sup> Students from rural areas rarely return to farming and herding after attending schools.<sup>409</sup> As a result, nomadic parents believe that the schools are designed to undermine their traditional way of life.<sup>410</sup> This perception, is confirmed by statements by PRC officials who emphasise that the goal of education is to ensure students are loyal to the CCP.<sup>411</sup>

To increase enrolment at schools the PRC could make the educational system more appealing to Tibetan families. Rather than ignore Tibetan successes and religion, while degrading Tibetan culture, the PRC could acknowledge the successes of Tibetan culture and the role religion played in it. The legal requirement to do this already exists in the PRC's Constitution.<sup>412</sup> However, this legal requirement has not been implemented. Instead, the PRC has implemented the "Three Guarantees Policy."<sup>413</sup> This policy does not change the curriculum. Instead, it aims to increase enrolment by providing families with financial incentives.<sup>414</sup> If the PRC is serious about increasing enrolment in Tibet it must follow its own laws and provide a curriculum that will assuage the parents' fears.

B. Language

The Tibetan students that do attend school are disadvantaged compared to their Chinese counterparts because the primary language of instruction is in Mandarin and not Tibetan. Despite this, Tibetan schools are increasingly using Mandarin as the medium of instruction. In 2014 a survey revealed that Tibetan students want to be taught in Tibetan and learn more efficiently when they are.<sup>415</sup>

In TAR Tibetan is the medium of instruction for primary schools.<sup>416</sup> At middle and high schools classes are in Mandarin.<sup>417</sup> This is one reason why so few Tibetan make the transition from primary school to middle school (fig. 14). Students face a difficult transition from using Tibetan in school to Mandarin. This is exacerbated because if a Tibetan student does not understand something the teachers are unable to explain it in Tibetan. The student must either understand the explanation in Mandarin or not at all.

The PRC's efforts to make Mandarin the language of instruction has been slowed by resistance from students and teachers. In Qinghai province in 2010 students staged protests against the use of Mandarin in primary schools. The protests succeeded in delaying the use of Mandarin in primary school.<sup>418</sup> The students feared that the introduction of Mandarin as the medium of instruction was designed wipe out Tibetan.<sup>419</sup> There were similar protest in Rebgong (Ch: Tongren) in Malho (Ch: Huangnan) TAP in Qinghai on 9 November 2012.<sup>420</sup> In November 2014, students protested the introduction of instruction in Mandarin in Dzoegé (Ch: Ruoergai) County in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) TAP in Sichuan Province.<sup>421</sup> The officials in Sichuan said that the switch to Mandarin would help students with their exams.<sup>422</sup>

If officials want to improve education and test results the solution is not to require younger and younger students to be taught in Mandarin. In addition to sparking protests, this could force more children to drop out of school earlier. A more practical approach would be to adopt mother tongue-based bilingual education. This approach has been very successful in Finland where almost 6% of the population speaks Swedish as a native language.<sup>423</sup> Mother tongue-based bilingual education requires all native Finnish speakers, almost 91% of the population, to study Swedish when they are about 13 years old. At the same age, native Swedish speakers are required to study Finnish.<sup>424</sup> Both groups are taught in their native language. This system removes the stigma of speaking a minority language.<sup>425</sup> Importantly, it also allows students to learn a second language while still getting the educational benefits of learning in their native language.

Implementing a system in Tibet would require Tibetan students to study Mandarin while being taught in Tibetan and Chinese students studying Tibetan while being taught in Mandarin. If successfully implemented, this system could improve Tibetan's test scores while not undermining Tibetan language or creating unnecessary barriers to education for Tibetans.

C. Geography

One of the most difficult problems facing any education system is how to reach rural communities. In Tibet, which is one of the least populated areas in the world, this problem is particularly pronounced.<sup>426</sup> In rural communities, the distance between families makes developing a centralized school system difficult. The PRC has attempted to address this issue by creating boarding schools. However, these schools have not succeeded. Part of the reason is that nomadic communities think the curriculum at boarding schools will undermine their culture. Another reason is that it is difficult to get teachers willing to teach in rural Tibet.<sup>427</sup>

The schools that are unable to get enough qualified teachers are understaffed or rely substitute teachers. Most small schools in TAR, referred to as “teaching spots” are so understaffed that they cannot offer all the required classes to elementary school students.<sup>428</sup> Substitute teachers are teachers that do not meet the minimum requirements to be official teachers.<sup>429</sup> In rural Tibetan areas, teachers that meet the minimum requirements are difficult to hire or refuse to work in impoverished rural areas.<sup>430</sup> The PRC’s minimum qualifications to teach do not take into account the differences between rural and urban areas or the local language and culture. This means that even when teachers who are qualified to teach go to rural areas they are not ready to teach effectively.

The PRC can increase the accessibility of schools by utilising mobile learning. At its most basic, mobile learning requires a radio. In 1948, Australia introduced mobile learning to provide people in rural areas with an education by broadcasting classes over the radio. Since then the programme has thrived and expanded. By 2005, it is present in all but two of Australia’s states and territories.<sup>431</sup>

With new technology, including the use of the Internet, mobile learning can reach people who would otherwise be inaccessible. According to official PRC information, the technology required to implement it already exists.<sup>432</sup> The PRC says that there are now 63,600 small schools including those in TAR that have digital teaching devices and resources in the PRC.<sup>433</sup> However, it is unclear whether they take full advantage of remote learning or merely provide communication technology to centralized schools. An essential element of mobile learning is that it decentralizes the education. Tibet is ideally situated for such mobile learning. If properly implemented it would also enable students to attend school without sacrificing their culture and language.

D. Conclusion

The census data demonstrated substantial problems with education in Tibet. Some of these problems are an unavoidable part of the Tibetan geography. Others represent the complexities of working with a minority culture that speaks a different language. None of these problems should prevent Tibetans from receiving an education. Other countries have been able to overcome similar problems. However, solving these problems would require a commitment by the PRC to improve education in Tibet. This would include teaching about Tibetan culture, teaching in Tibetan, and decentralizing schooling. Unfortunately, the PRC does not seem willing to make these necessary changes.

III. Nomad Resettlement

In 2014, the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy (TCHRD) published a report on the resettlement of Tibetan nomads.<sup>434</sup> The report argued that even though resettled Tibetan nomads are not recognized as Internally Displaced People (IDP) they face the same dangers and require the same protections.<sup>435</sup>

In Tibet the local governments have resettled or relocated almost the entire nomadic population. About 40% of ethnic Tibetans in Tibet are nomadic or semi-nomadic.<sup>436</sup> The resettlement of the Tibetan nomads will fundamentally and irreversibly alter Tibetan life and society.

Because of the large number of nomads and the resettlement programs impact the entire population. Between 2006 and 2012 in TAR, more than two-thirds of the entire population were effected by the relocation programs.<sup>437</sup> In Qinghai Province, 90% of the nomadic population was resettled by 2013.<sup>438</sup> In 2008, Sichuan Province announced it had resettled 80% of the nomadic population and expected to resettle the remaining 470,000 nomads by 2013.<sup>439</sup>

The legality of the resettlement of nomads is determined by various international legal instruments. In 2007, the UN Special Rapporteur on Adequate Housing provided basic principles and guidelines, based on existing human rights law, that apply to the displacement of people for the purposes of development. These guidelines established principles that should be followed before, during, and after displacement. The PRC's mass displacement of the Tibetan nomads violates these principles. This section will focus on the PRC's failure to fulfil its obligations prior to displacing the nomads.

The resettlement of the Tibetan nomads is usually implemented through false promises of a better life. Rather than help the nomads, the resettlement program leaves the previously self-sufficient nomads, without adequate housing, indebted, and unemployed.

A. International Law

Under international law forced evictions may only be carried out if certain specific criteria are met. If these criteria are not met then various human rights obligations are violated. These human rights include, among others, the right to an adequate standard of living in the ICESCR<sup>440</sup> and the prohibition against arbitrary interference with a person's family or home in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.<sup>441</sup> These obligations are binding on the PRC through human rights treaties and customary international law.<sup>442</sup>

According to the Special Rapporteur for Adequate Housing's report, before people can be displaced three requirements must be met. First, the displacement must be unavoidable and consistent with human rights.<sup>443</sup> Second, the people being displaced must be informed of the eviction, given an opportunity to challenge the displacement.<sup>444</sup> Third, the resettlement measures, including the construction of houses and schools, and the provision of utilities must be adequate and completed before the eviction.<sup>445</sup> The PRC has failed to meet these minimum standards.

B. Unavoidable and Consistent with Human Rights

The PRC offers various justifications for the resettlement of the nomads. The entire campaign to resettle Tibetan nomads is part of the PRC's efforts to create a "Socialist Countryside." The PRC has also attempted to justify many of the relocations projects as necessary to protect the environment. Neither of these explanations permit the resettlement of the nomads. In the specific instance of the Zangmu Dam in TAR, the displacement of approximately 330,000 could qualify as development based displacement.<sup>446</sup> However, the displacement is still not unavoidable.

1. Socialist Countryside

The PRC says the resettlement and relocation of Tibetan nomads and farmers will create a ‘Socialist Countryside’ that will bring modern agricultural operations and capacity to Tibet.<sup>447</sup> This justification does not assert that the resettlement/relocation is unavoidable, only that it will benefit the Tibetans. In reality, the nomads and farmers do not benefit from being resettled or relocated.

2. Environment

The PRC also claims that the resettlement of the nomads is necessary to protect the environment. Resettlement villages are a part of China’s development of a ‘Socialist Countryside’ and part of China’s ‘Tuimu Huancao’ policy. The Tuimu Huancao or “retire livestock and restore grassland” policy claims to “reverse severe grassland degradation” as well as “give herders the proper incentives both to better manage their land and also become more efficient market producers, thus raising their standard of living.”<sup>448</sup> This justification has no scientific basis. Instead, the newly acquired land is used to promote mining and destructive environmental practices.<sup>449</sup>

The PRC’s claim that relocation of nomads is necessary for environmental conservation is not scientifically sound. Before being resettled, Tibetans were practising techniques that had left the ecosystem undamaged for hundreds of years.<sup>450</sup> Overgrazing is not recognized as a major cause of grassland degradation; rather, resource extraction and climate change play a greater role in ecological harm to grasslands.<sup>451</sup> Long periods without livestock grazing have been shown to harm the ecosystem.<sup>452</sup>

In practice, the PRC does not attempt to protect the natural resources in the newly acquired land. Usually, the land the nomads were resettled from is opened up for mining. This includes open-pit mining, which tears up the grasslands that are being protected from overgrazing.<sup>453</sup>

Even when an environmental protection area is established mining continues unhindered. In 2014, Greenpeace published a report on an open pit coal mine in an environmental protection areas around the foothills of the Qilian Mountains in Qinghai Province. The mining violated conservation laws and polluted the water, grasslands, and wetlands.<sup>454</sup> The report described the Muli opencast coalfield as a “sprawling mining operation covering an area 14 times larger than the city of London, located in Mili (Ch: Muli) Tibetan Autonomous County in Liangshan Prefecture, Sichuan Province.”<sup>455</sup>

The mine has already severely harmed alpine meadows and glaciers that lead to headwaters of major river systems that feed most of South East Asia. In addition to current mining projects Greenpeace found that the government plans to open 16 more coalmines in the region.<sup>456</sup>

3. Zangmu Dam

The closest development related justification for the resettlement of the nomads offered by the PRC is to clear space for hydropower projects. The proposed Zangmu Dam is in Yarlung Tsangpo (Ch: Yalu Zangbu) canyon on a stretch of the Brahmaputra River in the Lhoka (Ch: Shannan) Prefecture in TAR. This project has had significant implications for Tibetan nomad population. It will cause the relocation of about 330,000 people. This would be the PRC's second largest resettlement plans.<sup>457</sup> Construction on the first section of the dam began on 22 November 2014.<sup>458</sup> Chinese state news agency Xinhua reported that the dam will generate 2.5 billion kilowatt hours of electricity every year.<sup>459</sup> TAR chairman Losang Jamcan spoke about how "the hydro plant is a good example of clean energy development"<sup>460</sup> and how it will help to solve Tibet's power need. Tibet's per capita energy consumption is less than one-third of PRC's national average.<sup>461</sup>

The Zangmu Dam is a necessary project and the displacement it causes is not unavoidable. It is not the solution; this source of energy is extremely inefficient in a region with freezing temperatures, and a more extensive sequence of dams will need to be built along the river to increase the energy production's profitability.<sup>462</sup> This will only further incentivise the PRC to relocate nomad while also damaging the environment and threatening downstream States' water supply.

C. Informed of and given an opportunity to challenge the eviction

The resettlement of the Tibetan nomads is accomplished through various tactics. Few of these tactics involve meaningfully informing the people of the eviction and none give the people an opportunity to challenge the eviction. When the authorities inform nomads of their imminent relocation the decision has already been made. The government officials do not provide room for discussion, nor do they consult an adequate representation of the village population.<sup>463</sup>

A common tactic involves coercing nomads into signing documents. The documents are later used to give the resettlement an appearance of legal process. However, merely obtaining the nomads signature does satisfy the PRC's legal obligations. In many cases the nomads sign the documents without understanding them, often because the agreements are written in Mandarin, which the nomads cannot understand. In other instances, the nomads sign the document either because they are under pressure from officials or because they are given false descriptions of the agreements.

Nomads who refuse to sign the documents or otherwise follow the government's dictates can be charged with making anti-nationalistic political statements or separatism and sentenced to a minimum of three years in prison.<sup>464</sup> Tibetans can also be subjected to extrajudicial punishments. On 30 Dec. 2014, four Tibetans were severely beaten by the police during a protest against the appropriation of their family farm to make space for police barracks and other projects in Dzamthang (Ch: Rangtang) in Ngaba (Ch: Aba) TAP in Sichuan Province.<sup>465</sup> The threat of prison or beatings prevents people from challenging their eviction and resettlement.

D. Adequate Housing or Land

As part of the effort to develop the Socialist Countryside, nomads are promised a better quality of life in a resettlement village. The Chinese government promises that the newly built resettlement will provide running water, stable, well-constructed houses, and electricity. Schools are promised for nomadic children who would not otherwise have access to an education. To help with the adjustment, nomads are promised compensation for resettling in villages and are told they will receive government stipends. These promises go unfulfilled.

Houses cost more than originally promised, and in many cases are not finished by the time the nomads are resettled. Once moved in, the resettled nomads find that their houses quickly begin to fall apart. Walls crack and crumble. The nomads are forced to sell their livestock in order to pay for their houses. In their houses, the nomads find they lack basic needs such as drinking water, proper nutrition, and fuel.<sup>466</sup> Moreover, families are too large for the provided houses and instead live in makeshift tarp tents, which are not adequate for the warmth or health of people living there.

The newly built villages are established on land that is eroding and unsuitable for cultivation. The villages are placed very close to major roads and are built with very tight quarters, often built in rows attached to each other.<sup>467</sup> Without enough space to grow or dry food, the nomadic traditional culture of self-sufficiency is being eroded.

To live in the resettlement villages the nomads are forced to sell their animals, which were previously the source of their entire livelihood. For example, yaks are the main source of food (milk, butter, cheese, meat), clothing, and shelter. Those who try to earn a living by farming and herding find the PRC mandates what they can grow and sell. Those who can grow crops and work on their land are often required to grow vegetables instead of grains.

Ever since people first moved onto the Tibetan Plateau about 3,500 years ago, grains have been a staple of the Tibetan diet.<sup>468</sup> Today, grains feed the farmers' families and livestock; grains are a reliable staple crop because they do not rot quickly and are easy to transport and sell in markets. In contrast, the vegetables that nomads are forced to grow do not serve as an effective food supply for livestock and also rot easily.<sup>469</sup>

Once the nomads are resettled and lose their livestock and land, they must adjust to an entirely new lifestyle. The nomads are promised stipends to help with the adjustment. However, the stipends are less than originally promised and payments of the stipends stop before the nomads are settled and able to acquire another form of income. The problems with the stipends are compounded because it is extremely difficult for nomads to find work once they have been resettled. Despite promises by the PRC, there is very limited access to proper vocational training. This prevents the resettled nomads from competing with Han Chinese migrant workers and makes them dependent on the PRC to survive. Without government support through stipends to aid families and without adequate vocational training, resettled Tibetan nomads find themselves in desperate situations with no way to lift themselves out. The Chinese government carries out very little research on the negative impacts of resettlement,<sup>470</sup> and as a result, efforts to mitigate the harms of failed relocation policies are feeble.

Some Tibetan nomads make a decent living by harvesting caterpillar fungus. Caterpillar fungus is one of the best, and often the only, source of income for resettled nomads. As an increasing number of nomads are resettled, harvesting caterpillar fungus has become a ‘gold rush.’ The nomads are able to sustain themselves because the price of caterpillar fungus is high. The livelihoods of the resettled nomads depend on the price remaining high. Because caterpillar fungus can only be harvested in the spring, many Tibetans borrow money from government banks to sustain themselves during the rest of the year. If the price of caterpillar fungus drops, the Tibetans will be unable to get out of debt.<sup>471</sup>

In the end, the Tibetans are left worse off than they were before. They are not provided with adequate housing or an opportunity to earn a living. This violates international law.

E. Conclusion

The PRC’s failure to provide the protection to the resettled nomads violates international law. It is part of a systematic effort to resettle the Tibetan population. The PRC is violating international law at its own risk. The human rights protections exist so that people can live a life of dignity. When those rights are violated people protest. In the case of resettled nomads, there were numerous protests against resettlement and mining operations in 2014. These protests were a direct result of the PRC failing to consult with the nomads and the failure to provide them with adequate housing. If the PRC continues to resettle the nomads without providing them with any input or compensation, the nomads and other Tibetans will be left with no option but to keep protesting.

INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY

I. States

Tibet is a major factor, if not the key factor, behind Sino-US and Sino-Indian diplomatic relations.<sup>472</sup> The United States and India are the only countries that have implemented some sort of formal policies on the issue of Tibet. Neither country supports Tibetan independence, instead acknowledging the one-China policy and recognition of Tibet as part of the People's Republic of China (PRC). Given the moral and strategic value of Tibet, the two countries have long been sympathetic to and involved in Tibetan issues.

Every time a United States president or senior US administration official visits the PRC, the question of human rights and religious freedom of the Tibetan people emerges, putting a strain on relations between the two countries. The asylum granted by India to the Dalai Lama and Tibetans in 1959 and the US Tibet Policy Act of 2002 passed by the US Congress testifies to this fact.

The geographical space of international community thus can be confined mostly to countries in the West and India, which hosts the Central Tibetan Administration, the de facto Tibetan Government in Exile. It also encompasses UN human rights bodies, global human rights watchdogs such as the Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, members of parliament, influential figures such as winners of Nobel Peace prize, religious authorities, legal experts, political activists and so on: in other words, the powerful bodies and individuals who are not necessarily working under a government.

A. Tibet, the US and the Scottish Referendum

The first statement on Tibet by an American official in 2014 came from Max Baucus, the nominee for US ambassador to the PRC.<sup>473</sup> In his testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Baucus, a senator from the US state of Montana said on 28 January 2014, "I will call on Chinese authorities to allow an independent civil society to play a role in resolving societal challenges; take steps to reduce tensions and promote long-term stability in Tibet and Xinjiang; and restart substantive talks with the Dalai Lama or his representatives, without precondition."<sup>474</sup>

This gesture of support by an American senator was followed in February by a lengthy debate in the Scottish parliament on Tibetan self-immolation protests.<sup>475</sup> During the debate, the Scottish parliament noted with grave concern that "at least 127 Tibetans have self-immolated, often fatally, since February 2009." The parliament expressed the "understanding" that these actions are largely acts of protest against restrictions on religion, the Tibetan language, access to employment and the degradation of water resources and grazing lands.<sup>476</sup>

Maureen Watt, the Scottish Member of Parliament, who proposed the motion for the debate, was much more outspoken and critical of the PRC.<sup>477</sup> She blamed the Chinese government's increasing repression in the form of military crackdown of Tibetan protest as the cause of Tibetan self-immolations. She expressed her solidarity to the relatives of the self-immolators, who have been subjected to severe collective punishment. She spoke about the Chinese government's attempts to prevent the news of self-immolations reaching the outside world through treacherous and violent means of bribery, arrest and torture. She raised the issue of Tibetan people's right to preserve and promote their language, culture and religion, including the issue of rampant Chinese mining activities in Tibet and the massive transfer of Han Chinese into Tibetan areas that threatens to change the demographic outlook of Tibet.<sup>478</sup> On 10 December 2014, Human Rights Day, UK Members of Parliament debated the issue of Tibet and freedom of expression, highlighting the ongoing repression and raising political prisoner cases.<sup>479</sup>

By far the most important event for Tibet in 2014 was the meeting between US President Barack Obama and the Dalai Lama on 21 February 2014.<sup>480</sup> The two Nobel Peace Laureates met at the White House Map Room to indicate that Obama was meeting the Dalai Lama "as the latter's capacity as a cultural and religious leader."

They did not meet in the Oval Office, where the American president receives leaders of sovereign countries. Despite the White House assurance that the US "recognizes Tibet as part of China and did not support independence," the Chinese government responded angrily to the meeting.<sup>481</sup>

Hua Chunying, a spokeswoman for the PRC's foreign ministry, said the meeting was "a gross interference in China's domestic politics" and "a severe violation of the principles of international relations. It will inflict grave damages upon the China-US relationship". Zhu Weiqun, former head of the Chinese Communist Party's United Front Work Department, wrote an article in the state-run website Tibet.cn, flaunting the PRC's economic might that can overcome any criticism about Tibet in the West: "We can only push the west to change its way of thinking if we let them understand that China's power cannot be avoided ... and that the west's interests lie in development and maintaining ties with China, not the opposite."<sup>482</sup>

On 15 February 2014, US Secretary of State, John Kerry, travelled Beijing and spoke with President Xi Jinping. Describing the meeting later, Kerry said:

I emphasized that respect for human rights and the exchange of information in a free manner contributes to the strength of a society in a country. Recent arrests of peaceful advocates for reform run counter, in our judgment, to all of our best interests and the ability to make long term progress. I emphasized that the United States remains concerned about these situations here in China, human rights situations – especially with respect to the Tibetan and Uighur areas.<sup>483</sup>

On 20 February 2014, the US government appointed Sarah Sewell as Under Secretary for civilian security, democracy, and human rights.<sup>484</sup> Sewell's responsibilities include that of serving as the special coordinator for the Tibetan issues as outlined in the Tibet Policy Act of 2002: "to promote dialogue between His Holiness the Dalai Lama or his representatives and the government of the People's Republic of China, as well as coordinate US government policies, programs and projects related to Tibet." On the second day of her office in Washington, she met with the Dalai Lama. Following the meeting she said she would work to coordinate the US government's "efforts to promote an end to interference by authorities into the religious affairs of the Tibetan people. In this role, I promote the policy of seeking to assist the preservation of the distinct religious heritage of Tibetans."<sup>485</sup> Such an assurance is critical given the Chinese government's systematic and violent suppression of Tibetans inside Tibet for worshipping the Dalai Lama as the head of Tibetan Buddhism.

Sewell visited Tibetan exile communities in India and Nepal in November. She met with the Dalai Lama and Sikyong Lobsang Sangay in Dharamsala, India. During her visit to the Tibetan refugee settlement in Delhi, she and Kathleen Stephens, the US ambassador to India who accompanied her, had a lengthy discussion with local Tibetan leaders about the problems being faced by Tibetans in and outside Tibet. Indicating that the US government will not change its policies on Tibet, she expressed, on behalf of the US government, her appreciation for the efforts of exile Tibetans under the leadership of the Dalai Lama.<sup>486</sup>

A bill in the US House of Representatives seeking access to Tibetan areas was issued in 2014.<sup>487</sup> The bipartisan bill, "The Reciprocal Access to Tibet Act," sponsored by congressmen Jim McGovern and Joe Pitts, promotes "access to Tibetan areas of China for US officials, journalists and average citizens." This bill, together with the desire expressed by the UN Human Rights Commissioner to visit Tibet, in some ways, meets the long-standing demand of the exile Tibetan leadership calling for the visit of UN human rights officials and foreign journalists to visit Tibet and independently report from there.<sup>488</sup>

B. Missed Meetings—Norway, South Africa and the Nobel Boycott

In 2014, the Norwegian Prime Minister, Erna Solberg refused to meet with the Dalai Lama when he visited Oslo in May 2014.<sup>489</sup> The refusal to meet the Dalai Lama by the Norwegian government was noteworthy, because the Dalai Lama had met previous Norwegian Prime Ministers and more so because the Tibetan spiritual leader was visiting Norway on the invitation of the Norwegian Nobel Committee to mark the 25th anniversary of the Dalai Lama winning the Nobel Peace Prize. Analysts cited the growing Chinese economic influence in Norway as the primary reason Erna Solberg refused to meet with the Dalai Lama. Some analysts said the decision "stems from the repercussions of the 2010 peace prize awarded to the Chinese dissident Liu Xiaobo, which angered the Chinese government to such an extent that it imposed an unofficial partial trade embargo on Norwegian salmon and froze trade talks."<sup>490</sup>

Norway's decision to not meet the Dalai Lama was followed by South Africa refusing to give the Dalai Lama a visa to attend the 14th World Summit of Nobel Peace Laureates that was scheduled to be held in Cape Town in October 2014. This was the third time in five years that the Tibetan leader was denied a South African. In 2012, a South African court ruled that "officials had acted unlawfully in failing to grant the Dalai Lama a visa in time for a 2011 trip to celebrate Tutu's 80th birthday celebrations, largely out of fears of angering the Chinese government."<sup>491</sup>

The refusal to grant the Dalai Lama a visa triggered a backlash, denting South Africa's image as the land that produced Nelson Mandela and other fearless human rights advocates. Fourteen Nobel Peace Laureates expressed outrage South African government.<sup>492</sup> They sent a letter to the South African government urging to grant the Dalai Lama a visa.<sup>493</sup>

As the South African government refused to change their decision, some of the Nobel Laureates cancelled their participation. The strong stand taken up by the fellow Nobel Laureates eventually led to the relocation of the summit from Cape Town to Rome.

While the successful boycott of the summit in Cape Town was a diplomatic success for the Tibetan movement another setback was waiting for the Tibetans. In Rome, Pope Francis, the head of the Roman Catholic Church at the Vatican, refused to meet the Dalai Lama. Observers again noted the ubiquitous influence of the Chinese government. Veteran China specialist Jonathan Mirsky called it "Pope Francis' China Problem," stating "there is always the possibility of detentions of prominent Catholics and their priests, and more punishments for Tibetan Buddhists, well-tried forms of Communist persecution. There also could be more at stake now that Beijing has signalled that it might consider improving relations with Rome."<sup>494</sup>

C. Crime and Punishment: Spain and Nepal

In late 2013, a Spanish court indicted Hu Jintao for genocide, torture, and crimes against humanity in Tibet.<sup>495</sup> In February 2014, the court issued arrest warrants for more retired Chinese leaders, including former-president Jiang Zemin and former-prime minister Li Peng.<sup>496</sup> The arrest warrants included a request that Interpol issue red notices for the PRC officials.<sup>497</sup> Red notices request the assistance of the 190 Interpol member States to locate, arrest, and extradite the wanted people.<sup>498</sup> The PRC reacted angrily to the arrest warrants and claimed that they interfered with the PRC's internal affairs.<sup>499</sup>

As part of the court's investigation, Hu Jintao was sent 48 questions about his involvement in the repression in Tibet. The questions were designed to give Hu Jintao a chance to respond to the charges brought against him. One question focused on Hu Jintao's knowledge of the consequences of his campaign against Tibetans that caused 450 deaths, the wounding of another 7,000, the 350 disappearances, and 3,000 detentions when he was party secretary of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR).<sup>500</sup>

In response to the arrest warrants and pressure from the PRC, Spain's ruling People's Party proposed changing their law to block the criminal cases from continuing. One day after the arrest warrants were issued, Spain Congress of Deputies voted 179 to 163 to change the law.<sup>501</sup> Seventeen Catalonian, Spanish, and international organizations published an open letter saying the change in law violated Spain's international legal obligations.<sup>502</sup> After the law was changed, the case against the Chinese leaders was dropped.<sup>503</sup>

While the PRC was pressuring Spain to change its domestic laws in violation of its international obligations, the PRC was also increasing its financial investments in Nepal. The PRC's investments in Nepal will increase from US$24 million to US$128 million in 2015-2016.<sup>504</sup> This money supplements other development projects in Nepal that are funded by the PRC, including a major hydropower project.<sup>505</sup> In exchange for these investments, the PRC wanted Nepal to return Tibetan refugees to the PRC.<sup>506</sup> The PRC has also pressured Nepal to limit the human rights of Tibetans in Nepal. These restrictions include limiting travel and peaceful assemblies.<sup>507</sup> The return of Tibetan refugees to the PRC and the persecution of Tibetans in Nepal are both prohibited by international law.<sup>508</sup>

II. Intergovernmental Organizations and NGO activism

In 2014, the Tibetan issue was raised at various other international forums. These forums rely on collective international action and can exert pressure on the PRC and other States to improve the situation in Tibet. The UN and EU are capable of focusing attention on the situation in Tibet and the PRC's failure to live up to its international obligations. These multinational forums also force the PRC to respond to accusations and facts concerning the treatment of Tibetans. These multinational forums also provide a chance for NGOs to speak directly to the PRC and amplify their voice and influence.

in Tibet was discussed at the 27th session of the United Nation's Human Rights Council (HRC) in Geneva, Switzerland. Several NGOs discussed the "deteriorating situation in Tibet."<sup>509</sup> The Asian Indigenous and Tribal People's Network (AITPN) cited TCHRD's report that official Chinese autopsy reports demonstrated that machine guns were used against protesters in 2008. Based on this revelation, the AITPN urged the UN Committee against Torture, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions "to intervene with PRC authorities" who indulge in torture and extra-judicial killings in Tibet.

Human Rights Watch drew attention to the fact that the PRC has 13 unanswered requests from UN Special Procedures and has not invited the OHCHR to visit the PRC, despite its commitment to do so. During the session, a few countries, notably USA, United Kingdom and Italy "drew attention to the increase of arbitrary and forced disappearances... persecution of human rights defenders... and start meaningful dialogues with Tibetans."<sup>510</sup>

At the HRC session, the TCHRD's director, Ms. Tsering Tsomo spoke on behalf of the Society for Threatened Peoples. ## B. European Union

On 8-9 December 2014, the European Union and the PRC held the 33rd round of the EU-China Dialogue on Human Rights in Brussels.<sup>514</sup> One of the issues raised was the denial of human rights in Tibet.<sup>515</sup> The EU members of parliament also discussed issues such as freedom of religion or belief, freedom of expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and association; the due process of law; arbitrary detention; the condition of Tibetan political prisoners and the death penalty in Tibet and Xinjiang. EU officials brought up the imprisonment of Tenzin Delek Rinpoche, Uyghur scholar Ilham Tohti, the Mongolian activist Hada, Nobel Laureate Liu Xiaobo, Gao Yu, Pu Zhiqiang, Xu Zhiyong, and Gao Zhisheng.<sup>516</sup>

III. Businesses and Tibet

The role of businesses operating in Tibet was an increasingly prominent issue in 2014. As the PRC's economic power grows multinational corporations are working to find a way to do business in the PRC. The PRC has required all businesses that work in the PRC to follow its domestic laws—even if those laws violate human rights.<sup>517</sup> Despite agreeing to follow the PRC's laws, multinational corporations were still targeted by the PRC for violating vague

A. Internet and Technology

At the end of 2014, Facebook deleted a post by Woeser, the Tibetan writer and activist. The post was a video of Kalsang Yeshi's self-immolation. Facebook said the post was deleted because it did not meet its community standards.<sup>519</sup> However, the censorship came shortly after the founder of Facebook, Mark Zuckerberg began establishing the foundation for Facebook to be permitted in the PRC. In the months before Woeser's post was deleted Mark Zuckerberg held a question-and-answer session in Mandarin at a university in Beijing, invited the PRC's top internet regulator to Facebook's headquarters, and prominently displayed a copy of Xi Jinping's book.<sup>520</sup> The censorship of the self-immolation video drew criticism from people concerned that Facebook was willing to abandon its principles to gain access to the PRC.<sup>521</sup>

In 2014, LinkedIn and Microsoft's search engine Bing both zealously censored politically sensitive material. Both companies changed their policies after news of their participation in censorship became public. LinkedIn censored material published from the PRC or by people who said they lived in the PRC.<sup>522</sup> LinkedIn now allows posts blocked in the PRC to be seen elsewhere.<sup>523</sup> Bing was censoring more search results than Chinese based search engines like Baidu.<sup>524</sup> After being contacted about censoring search results, Bing removed some restrictions.<sup>525</sup>

Numerous anti-Tibet accounts were discovered on Twitter. These accounts were registered under fake "Anglo-Saxon sounding" names and included photographs of models, actors, and high school students.<sup>526</sup> These accounts were used to post propaganda from PRC controlled media outlets that were designed to portray Tibetans as happy with the PRC's policies and the situation in Tibet. Some accounts focused on attacking the Dalai Lama.<sup>527</sup> Hours after these fake accounts were exposed Twitter began deactivating them.<sup>528</sup>

B. Tourism and Travel

Chinese government sources claim that 15 million tourists visited TAR in 2014, 20% more than in 2013. A record of 3.15 million people flew to TAR in 2014.<sup>529</sup> There are now 44 air routes connecting 33 Chinese cities to TAR. To accommodate the massive numbers of tourists the luxury hotels have started investing in TAR.

Most publically, the InterContinental Hotels Group, the world's largest hotel chain, opened a resort called "Lhasa Paradise" in August 2014.<sup>530</sup>

The opening of the hotel spurred protests at InterContinental hotels around the world.<sup>531</sup> The protests focused on how the luxury hotel would play into the PRC's perpetuation of the 'Shangri-La' myth and the idea that Tibetans in the PRC are happy and treated well.<sup>532</sup> Human rights NGOs also argued that the hotel would perpetuate discrimination in Tibet and provide support for the continuing human rights abuses. Intercontinental responded by saying that it would provide economic development to Lhasa and it hoped its work force would be 40% Tibetan.<sup>533</sup>

In April 2014, Shangri-La Hotels opened a hotel in Lhasa.<sup>534</sup> The opening of the luxury hotel in Lhasa did not receive as much attention or criticism as InterContinental's hotel. Instead, attention focused on the connection between Shangri-La Hotels and the mythical monastery in James Hilton's novel Lost Horizon that it got its name from. People have speculated that Hilton based Shangri-La in Tibet.<sup>535</sup> However, despite the lack of attention, Shangri-La's hotel faces the same difficulties as InterContinental's Lhasa Paradise.

In its response InterContinental said that it would follow its own corporate code of conduct and the laws and regulations in the PRC.<sup>536</sup> Both

InterContinental and Shangri-La have endorsed the UN Global Compact.<sup>537</sup> The UN Global Compact is joined by businesses that commit to ten universally accepted principles that cover human rights, labour, the environment, and anti-corruption.<sup>538</sup> The human rights principles in the ten universal principles are: 1) support and respect the protection of international proclaimed human rights; and 2) ensure that the business is not complicit in human rights violations.<sup>539</sup>

InterContinental's response did two things. First, it attempted to portray corporate responsibility as a top-down exercise where the benefits trickled down to people. This fundamentally misunderstands the human rights system, including the model outlined in the UN Global Compact. Human rights belong to individuals and give them the right to demand their rights be protected.<sup>540</sup> The emphasis is on what individuals are entitled to and not what a corporation chooses to give them.

Second, InterContinental's response implies that there is no contradiction between its corporate responsibility, the UN Global Compact, and the PRC's laws. However, the PRC has adopted policies and laws that systematically violate human rights in Tibet. While not all of these repressive laws will impact InterContinental's business, some inevitably will. For example, InterContinental lists as key human rights achievements in both 2013 and 2014 a "foundational standard" that requires all InterContinental Hotels to display a Human Rights policy.<sup>541</sup> This would be clear support for human rights as required by the UN Global Compact. However, in the PRC human rights documents, including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, are considered “reactionary literature.”<sup>542</sup> In 1996, after five years in prison Kelsang Thutob died in detention. He was imprisoned for producing a Tibetan translation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.<sup>543</sup> It remains to be seen how InterContinental and Shangri-La will address these conflicting obligations.
